THE GRAVITY OF THOUGHT

The two essays which make up this volume, "The Forgetting of Philosophy" and the "The Weight of a Thought" represent a meditation of the changing role of philosophy in a postmodernist context, without the reactive impulse of returning to past configurations of thought. Together these essays represent a distinctive elaboration of many of the themes which have recently occupied the work of Jean-Luc Nancy. Challenging the neomodernist projects of a "return" to Enlightenment, Nancy argues that these attempts ignore the true task of philosophy, which is not to manipulate or reactivate past significations, but to expose itself to the essential opening of meaning, to its event. This exposure reveals the finitude of thought, its "weight," to the extent that thought can only take place at the limit of significations, at the place where no full appropriation is possible.

"In The Gravity of Thought, Jean-Luc Nancy gives a clear and moving account of many of his leading ideas as he develops further his understanding of materiality, meaning, and limit. It is an excellent presentation of his constructive thinking, accessible to people who are not trained previously in philosophy and a significant contribution to contemporary thought. Well translated and introduced, this book engages primary philosophical issues with exceptional insight and power of expression."

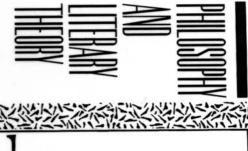

Charles E. Scott

Edwin Erle Sparks Professor of Philosophy
The Pennsylvania State University

Jean-Luc Nancy is Professor of Philosophy and chair of the Department of Philosophy at the University of Strasbourg, France. Born in France in 1942, a student of Derrida, Nancy has written widely on the major figures of Western philosophy. Some of his analyses, particularly of Hegel's concept of Aufhebung and Kant's categorical imperative, have been influential. His work focuses on theories of meaning and its textual construction, and explores the boundaries of literature and philosophy. François Raffoul is Assistant Professor of Philosophy at the State University of New York at Stony Brook. Gregory Recco is a graduate student in philosophy at the Pennsylvania State University.

Humanities Press New Jersey

THOUGH THOUGH

EAN-LUC NANCY

Translated by François Raffoul and Gregory Recco

2430 N263

Philosophy and Literary Theory

Series Editor: Hugh J. Silverman

This series provides full-scale, in-depth assessments of important issues in the context of philosophy and literary theory, as they inscribe themselves in the developing archieve of textual studies. It highlights studies that take a philosophical or theoretical position with respect to literature, literary study, and the practice of criticism. The individual volumes focus on semiotics, hermeneutics, post-phenomenology, deconstruction, postmodernism, feminism, cultural criticism, and other new developments in the philosophico-literary debate.

Stephen Barker
Autoaesthetics

Robert Bernasconi Heidegger in Question

Véronique M. Fóti Heidegger and the Poets*

Richard Kearney
Poetics of Modernity

Jean-François Lyotard Towards the Postmodern*

Michael Naas Turning: From Persuasion to Philosophy Jean-Luc Nancy The Gravity of Thought

Wilhelm S. Wurzer Filming and Judgment*

*Available in paperback

The Gravity of Thought

Jean-Luc Nancy

Translated by François Raffoul and Gregory Recco

HUMANITIES PRESS NEW JERSEY

Presses Universitaires de Grenoble. interdit de reproduire cet ouvrage, en tout ou en partie, sous quelque forme que ce soit, sans la permission écrite de l'éditeur Les Éditions le Griffon d'argile et Les réservés. Traduction autorisée de l'édition française originale copyright © 1992 par Copyright © 1993 by Les Éditions le Griffon d'argile inc., Sainte-Foy (Québec) Canada et Les Presses Universitaires de Grenoble, Grenoble, France. Tous droits Les Éditions le Griffon d'argile et les Presses Universitaires de Grenoble. Il est

First published in English by Humanities Press International, Inc. 165 First Avenue, Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey 07716

Part 1, "The Forgetting of Philosophy," first published in French as "L'Oubli de la philosophie" by Éditions Galilée, © 1986 by Éditions Galilée.

Part 2, "The Weight of a Thought," first published in French as "Le Poids d'une pensée," © 1991 by Les Éditions le Griffon d'argile and Les Presses Universitaires de English translation @ 1997 by Humanities Press International, Inc.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Nancy, Jean-Luc.

and Gregory Recco. The gravity of thought / Jean-Luc Nancy; translated by François Raffoul

cm.—(Philosophy and literary theory)

Translated from the French.

ISBN 0-391-03985-7 Includes index.

Philosophy. 2. Criticism. 3. Thought and thinking.
 Postmodernism. I. Title. II. Series.
 B2430.N363G73 1997

96-8808 CIP

any form or by any means, without written permission. All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted, in

Printed in the United States of America

11. The Simple Truth

53

51

10. Being Exposed to the Limit

Contents

9. The West at Its Ends	8. The Exhaustion of Signification	7. Meaning Signified	6. The Project of the Subject	5. The Displacement of Meaning	4. The Will to Meaning	3. The Schema of the Return	2. Introduction	1. Prefatory Note	PART ONE: THE FORGETTING OF PHILOSOPHY	Gravity: Introductory Remarks	Acknowledgments	Translator's Preface
47	43	37	31	27	17	13	9	7		1	iiixxx	VII:

vi / CONTENTS

Index	Notes	The Weight of a Thought	PART TWO: THE WEIGHT OF A THOUGHT	14. On Passivity	13. On Wonder	12. We Are Meaning
91	85	75		69	65	57

Translator's Preface

A moment arrives when one can no longer feel anything but anger, an absolute anger, against so many discourses, so many texts that have no other care than to make a little more sense, to redo or perfect delicate works of signification.

—Jean-Luc Nancy, The Birth to Presence

What I am attempting to "signify" here is nothing more than this: meaning at the limit of signification...

[Logos] has the capacity to encounter itself at its own limit (in the end, perhaps I am speaking here only of this encounter), and, consequently, to encounter there that which exceeds its signification.

—Jean-Luc Nancy, The Gravity of Thought

Jean-Luc Nancy's philosophical work (sometimes coauthored with Philippe Lacoue-Labarthe)¹ has become increasingly well known on the American intellectual scene.² It would clearly be impossible, within the limits of this preface, to do justice to the remarkable breadth, richness, and complexity of these writings.³ I will therefore confine my comments to the main themes developed in the two texts presented here. Written in May 1986, The Forgetting of Philosophy is situated squarely in the philosophical debates of the day. Nancy observes that although many publications proclaim their intention to return to or recover true philosophy (that of the Enlightenment) after nearly two centuries of allegedly deviant thought, the tasks, responsibilities, and urgency of philosophy have in fact been forgotten. Indeed, if, as Nancy claims, the task of philosophy is to think the present by exposing itself to the end or exhaustion of Western

a return to past values, Ideas, and significations. return to past significations can only amount to a forgetting of philosophy. As text, which addresses the recent "reactionary" movement of thought advocating significations and to what comes to us from such an end, the attempts to Nancy himself admits (Gravity, 1), The Forgetting of Philosophy is a "polemical"

will not consist in debating these "neomodern" authors on specific technical Strangely, however, and despite its prevalence, nowhere in these thoughts is called unfinished project of modernity (in Habermas's celebrated expression).6 modern project of the Enlightenment, is supposed to have been missed, the soset by Jürgen Habermas and others. Their intention: to salvage what, in the ment. Specifically, these authors advocate a return to the humanism of the a no less brutal "solution" is proposed: a return to the very ideals and values gerous, and last but not least, morally irresponsible. In short, these thoughts post-Heideggerian thoughts (as manifested in the work of such French think-"diagnosis," can be roughly summarized as follows: post-Nietzschean and cally analyzable and, in this respect, already obsolete. Their argument, or Philosophy of the Sixties, a somewhat journalistic denomination that, as such, so-called poststructuralist or postmodern ideas, which they categorize as the certain academic opportunism.5 In this text, the authors take as their target the polemical and virulent essay, whose intentions were clearly not devoid of a points, but, rather, in identifying the assumptions that underlie the very project return to Kant? The question is not even posed. In this text, Nancy's strategy an instrument in the service of a preestablished agenda: Why, for instance, this ration of this motif is offered. In fact, the notion of return simply functions as Enlightenment, to the dominant values of modernity, following the example that have come into question in the poststructuralist or the postmodern moveitself to fulfill the function of a critique. Following this expeditious diagnosis, would essentially be "nihilistic," this latter adjective understood as sufficient in results as well as in their assumptions; they are politically suspect, if not daners as Deleuze, Foucault, Derrida, and Lacan) are essentially perverse in their reduces these thoughts to a phenomenon (if not a "disease") that is sociologithe notion of the return problematized as such. Hardly any philosophical elabo-In 1985, Luc Ferry and Alain Renaut published La Pensée '68, a highly

THE CRITIQUE OF THE RETURN

to reemerge intact. In a sense, these thoughts are symptomatic of a protest tory, an ideal identity that would have been, so to speak, kept frozen but able possibility of a return of the "same," an identity of meaning unaltered by his-According to Nancy, the thoughts of the return assume from the outset the

> ing is thus understood as the answer to the "crisis" of meaning. intuition) and which is maintained on the teleological horizon of thinking as a and empty. These values are then treated as the lowest common denominators. settle on significations (such as "humanism") that have become commonplace significations may have lost their force or meaning, because they fail, in other last attempt to preserve some force in meaning. The return to an ideal mean-Idea, which, by definition, is empty of content (it cannot be "presented" in an (for example in Ferry and Renaut) of the Kantian notion of the regulative They are "embraced" only minimally, if not negatively. Hence the importance words, to reflect upon the limit of the very order of significations, they must do not reflect upon the exhaustion of traditional significations, on how these meaning, of some established signification. Because the "thinkers of the return" infinity of meaning: it is rather the trivial return of some particular preconstituted same is not equivalent to that of Nietzsche, who calls for an exposure to an able, or at least ready to be recaptured in its original purity. This return of the to itself, that must never have been lost, and that would therefore still be availthe return of a meaning (the "right," or "correct" one) that must be identical to "correct" or "rectify" what they see as deviances, neomodern authors demand which, for that reason, have been called "philosophies of difference." In order of difference, differance, dissemination, displacement, errancy, and so on, and nificant that their main targets are those thoughts that elaborate problematics against the frustration of identity to which our time exposes us. It is not insig-trivialized, its symptoms traced back to contingent or accidental causes. (and hence, of the whole order of significations) is exposed, the crisis is all but ing in the crisis of meaning the moment at which the exhaustion of any archi standing of crisis as motivating this demand for meaning. Instead of recognizescapes real history. The fact of history is denied, as is apparent in the underbe atemporal. A guiding or transcendent principle is called for, a principle that we have the profound ahistoricism of these various thoughts of "return." Apreturn to a "healthy" past (and to a good conscience!), in short, to Kant. Here peal is always made to a transhistorical norm, to "values" that are presumed to After two centuries that have essentially changed and modified nothing, we two centuries, the return to Kant is in fact a return to an atemporal reason. Because this ideal meaning does not seem to have been affected by the past conflated) are irrationalists. Heidegger is a quasi-mystical thinker, and so on thinking on history is qualified as "monstrous." Nietzsche and Freud (always pened. History is judged to be either worthless, aberrant, or deviant. Hegel's so is to be condemned. History can be denied because what has happened, for these neomoderns, has no real significance; in a sense, it hasn't really hap-In fact, the crisis is understood as an aberration. It should not have been, and is not certain that history presents the return of anything whatsoever: "In history, who "rectifies" deviances, and who claims to recover past significations. But it Nierzsche spoke, that "subtle reader of symptoms," but the brutal dogmatist tory. The "thinker of the return" is not the "physician of civilization" of whom ries. The crisis is understood as a simple illness, a "passing disorder" (Gravity, not read, but reduced to formulas, caricatures, if not mere journalistic summa-In fact, the very enterprise of return reveals a fundamental structure in the questions do not return any more than do the faces of individuals" (ibid., 13). In short, the thoughts of Hegel, Marx, Nietzsche, Freud, Heidegger, et al. are Western order of significations, that is, the project of a subjective appropriation 17) that can be treated bluntly with massive excisions of entire epochs of his-

of meaning into a remainderless circle or system.

This subjective enclosure is revealed in the schema of the return. As such, it subjectivity. In the Cartesian will, in the drive for the unconditioned in Kant, of the return with the "negative" contemporary thoughts of lack (such as Lacan's) or loss of meaning, which then gets posited as an object of desire, initiating circle. It is completed in the structure of return because the return designates or rather of signification [since, as Nancy stresses, it is on the basis of the to-mean" or vouloir-dire, which presents philosophy as a purveyor of meaning, or in the determination of the essence of self-consciousness in Hegel, the subthat they take as their targets. In both cases, the problematic of lack subtends Positing meaning as lacking betrays the paradoxical complicity of the thoughts assumed by the project of signification as a project of a total presentation. the activity of the project of modernity; meaning is to be recaptured, that is, distance." This presence-at-a-distance rests upon the positing of a mythical lack meaning as the telos of a project, that is, as Nancy puts it, as "present-at-ais organized according to an entire system of desire and lack that constitutes "logic of signification." or structure of signification recognizes and signifies itself as its own subject" ognizes itself as the ultimate signified. This amounts to saying that the process repeats and reflects, develops and closes the circle of the appropriation of meaning meaning and of itself as the subject of meaning: "philosophy simultaneously the very logic of philosophy as the project of a subjective appropriation of as signification is engendered" (ibid., 31)]. The project of meaning comes full position of meaning as an object of desire "that the determination of meaning become a subject" (Gravity, 31): Meaning is assigned to a will, literally a "willject is presented as a subject of desire, that is, as Nancy explains, "the desire to (ibid., 43). The return is perhaps the final form taken by what Nancy calls the In its completed form, this circle is as follows: the subject of signification rec-

In this respect, the circular structure of the return, its denial of history, of open character of meaning, its "eventual" nature. This implies that meaning of the "circle of the appropriation of meaning." But what becomes apparent in entation that repeats the most deeply rooted metaphysical desire: the completion limits of subjectivity: does not belong to a subject, because, in a sense, meaning opens up at the the difference that Nancy stresses between these two kinds of return is the tion of meaning (that is, the desire for meaning) is fulfilled in a perfect presis presented in the meaning of words and vice versa" (Gravity, 22). The intenintuitions (as in Kant).9 Signification takes place when "the meaning of things in the guise of the perfect, remainderless adequation between concepts and commanding these thoughts is a meaning that is achieved, completed, closed, already established, presented, namely, to a simple signification; the ideal of meaning itself. In the thoughts of the return, the return is always to a meaning that is ment of meaning and would ultimately reveal the open character of meaning the possibility of an event; it would indicate the very movement or displaceretrievable expenditure of meaning, the indefinite deferral of a simple return, or "policed" by a thought-might indicate a journey, a distance, a difference. argue that the return of meaning-if not predetermined, directed by a subject is subjugated to the return 10 meaning. But Nancy insists on the distinction between the return of meaning and the return 10 meaning. He is thus able to This return would then include the possibility of a detour, of a drift, a nongone astray—will occur through the return to meaning: the return of meaning comes the call for a return of meaning. For the thoughts of the return, the return of meaning-which has been supposedly lost or lost sight of, which has Against the background of a crisis—understood as a lack or loss of meaning itself? Clearly, the call for a return to meaning exhibits a demand for meaning. in principle closed upon itself" (Gravity, 13). How does this closure present in the form of the return or under the heading of the return," he explains, "is turn" insofar as it takes the form of a return to. As such, Nancy claims, the lightenment) reveals the closure of thinking upon itself: "all that is presented to freedom-in short, to humanism and the progressive optimism of the Enreturn to (to Kant, to universal reason, to the value of values, to the subject, openness of meaning. This peculiar closing off appears in the project of "reits movement, and also of its errancy, is nothing but the obliteration of the or will be, the effect of history, which has never ceased to give rise to the pains indeed to determine the meaning of the return of the question of What is one asking, henceforth, when one asks for meaning? What is it to ask for meaning? What is the meaning of this request? I would be at great unprecedented, precisely because history itself is not someone and is not meaning. It is no one's exclusive province to effect this determination: it is, emphasis added) a subject (a subject is, perhaps, bound only to reproduce itself). And yet, I know—with a knowledge that is accessible to anyone who does not claim to let it think, or to let it come to be-I know that this meaning could not to rule over thought, or to make himself its overseer, but who intends rather take any other form (if it is a "form") than that of an opening. (Gravity, 10 other configuration, is that from which and by which meaning opens up. A finite thought of meaning does not set off a project of total presentation from "loss" or closure of meaning, like a withdrawing wave already tracing out anbe recaptured and has therefore never been lost. Instead, the movement of thoughts of the return is only a simulacrum, for the so-called lost meaning can modified). There is nothing lost to which one ought to return. The loss in the return to the original meaning, sublated and 'comprehended'" (SV, 223; trans anticipation of meaning does not open "the circular perspective of the final always already caught (as in the classical motif of presupposition). Hence the is no origin to return to. Meaning does not precede the circle in which it is come back to itself by stretching itself between its withdrawing ends, birth and withdrawal of both origin and end, just as Dasein can only come to itself and anticipate itself if its own origin is withdrawn. Its movement is engendered meaning before the anticipatory movement of understanding. Meaning can only an anticipation of meaning which is or constitutes meaning itself [qui fait le ing is its very opening. Nancy writes that "understanding is possible only by a movement made possible by the withdrawal of both origin and telos. Meanconsists in such an anticipation, that is, in and as such an opening. Meaning is Because meaning consists entirely in its opening, and is exhausted therein, there death. This structure of anticipation defers any possibility of a "return to." from the lack of both origin and end. The necessity of anticipation lies in the in such an anticipation. In fact, anticipation itself is only possible if there is no sens lui-même]" (SV, 223; trans. modified). Meaning anticipates itself and lies It is the movement of anticipation itself that makes such a reference possible, being caught in the circle of Auslegung, nor does it maintain itself as its telos. not presupposed in the anticipation of understanding, it does not precede its nothing other than the very opening of meaning; more precisely, it indicates of the movement of Auslegung (interpretation or clarification) reveals for Nancy Auslegung, and of the motif of the hermeneutic circle. The anticipatory nature tion of Heidegger's thesis of the anticipatory character of understanding, of essentially open character of meaning through a radicalization and appropriacan be traced back to Sharing Voices, in which Nancy had emphasized the that meaning itself opens up in the structure of understanding insofar as it This problematic of an opening of meaning, or rather of meaning as opening, > imagined loss. openness of meaning. This is why it is absurd to return to the "before" of an the right word" (BP, 90-92; trans. modified). Loss, or closure, constitutes the place just at the other." As Nancy puts it: "To half-open [s'entr'ouvrir]: this is as the 'loss' in the 'they' by which the opening of Dasein is truly opened." which meaning opens up: "What is lost in this must therefore be understood finitude of the opening. The loss of meaning is a loss through which and by opening of Eigentlichkeit (as a mode of disclosure), he emphasizes the essential a "minuscule" (infime) opening, as it were. There, in the context of a discussion Furthermore, "the closing-off is proportional to the opening up, and each takes of the belonging together of Uneigentlichkeit (as a mode of closure) and the Nancy elaborates further this notion of an opening that opens in its very closure which meaning happens" (Gravity, 70-71). In "The Decision of Existence, ex-propriation at the heart of appropriation. "This is why," explains Nancy, pearance of a previous signification, or else, as the withdrawal of meaning by meaning as such-should be understood in two ways: as the imaginary disap-"the original representation of philosophy—i.e., as a 'loss' of meaning, or of finite movement of the event of meaning as the inscription (ex-scription) of the imaginary lack of its completion, but rather attempts to understand the

comes to an end, not because of some weakness or incompleteness—Nancy return deny the constitutive finitude of meaning. Meaning exhausts itself, it rejects the negative problematics of lack or of a so-called weak thought—but ing-open is nothing other than Being-finite" (ibid., 79). The thoughts of the openness of meaning through the project of a return to meaning is also an attempt to negate or deny the intrinsic limit or finitude of meaning, for "Bedeny the task of thinking on or from such a limit. Indeed, the negation of the return is a will to deny such an exposure to the limit. Such a will wants to that has come to rest on and expose itself to its limit" (ibid., 60). The will to itself as that singular sending, that "gigantic Western trajectory of signification return to, Nancy reminds us that our history, the history of meaning, presents sending of a destination" which has exhausted itself, and which is becoming, well as singular fact, a certain "quantity of movement," an "élan, departure, or "as if before our very eyes, insignificant" (Gravity, 48). In opposition to the destines us. Nancy describes meaning in terms of a finite event, a material as tion."10 Meaning is not projected or thrown by a subject; rather, it throws or understands meaning as a finite sending that destines us to our "shared conditions of a meaning emerging from a project or a will (i.e., a subject), Nancy turn, for he understands the attempt to return to a previous configuration of thought to be an inversion of the very movement of meaning. Unlike concep-In a sense, Nancy goes against the course taken by the thoughts of the re-

end should then be reconsidered in terms of limit (meaning is nothing other than the limit of signification), or what Nancy calls in Une pensée finie an because its end is at once its point of exhaustion and its only resource. The

or at the limit, to this event of meaning. one of "managing" or manipulating significations, but of exposing oneself, on very limit. If meaning can only be an open meaning, the issue becomes not significations opens it to an "other" that comes to question metaphysics at its itself its end and limit" (Gravity, 51). The closure or limit of the order of by its very completion and by the power that makes the logos confront by closed or finished. "Rather," he explains, metaphysics "is wide open, opened Nancy also calls the order of significations, does not mean that metaphysics is is exposed" (PF, 48). This is why the closure or end of metaphysics, which limit as that from which existence, being infinitely finite, arises and 10 which it of limitation, which implies the limitlessness of a beyond, but a thought of the to existence. We "need" a finite thought, says Nancy, that is, "not a thought thought of a lack, but a thought of the limit as that which is absolutely proper carries its end as its own" (SM, 54). A finite or finished thought is not a In that case, as Nancy explains in a recent text, finitude indicates "that which returns. In that sense, the end or limit is not a moment that is reached at the "end" of a journey, but rather the secret resource of a finite or finished thought. its beginning. The end is the point from which meaning arises and to which it which something stops but . . . that from which something begins its presencing sense of limit (peras), defined in Building Dwelling Thinking as "not that at [Wesen],"11 Nancy shows that a meaning's end as extremity is at the same time therefore, as its completion. Recalling Heidegger's reappropriation of the Greek meaning as an exposure to the "extremity" or "radicality" of thought, and not, In the same passage, Nancy interprets the event of reaching the "end" of

THE "OTHER THOUGHT": ON THE LIMIT

theme of an overcoming (Uberwindung) of metaphysics (which, it should be ironic reference to Heidegger's call for another beginning. In Heidegger, the expression "another thought" (Gravity, 52), it is, it seems to us, a somewhat thought to be an "overcoming" of metaphysics at its end. When he uses the the "unfinished" project of modernity. Nancy does not understand the task of one returns in order to start again in the right direction, that is, to accomplish of significations, a problematic in fact shared by the thoughts of the return: to the problematics of progress or progression assumed by the various projects advocate some sort of "march forward." Such a conception would still belong In opposition to the retrograde movement of return, Nancy then does not > pressed, the forgotten, the recalled, etc.)" (ibid., 47). idea of the 'before' is already caught in a network of metaphysical significations (the prior, the causal, the archaic, the primitive, the originary, the native, the re-'go back' to before metaphysics. There is nothing 'before' the West, if the very language of significations. "There is no sense," Nancy explains, "in wanting to of metaphysics. Whatever "before" or "after" means is already assigned in the physical order of significations; nor will it come through a return to any "before" exposure, existence, or "sharing," will not occur beyond, or after, the meta-28). That other thought, whether it be called "finite thought," thought of that of opening and undoing that which encloses itself in signification" (ibid., the moment "when, and the move by which, the signifying will knows itself as such, knows itself to be insignificant, and by itself releases a new demand for 'meaning." (ibid., 51). In fact, meaning "has perhaps no other meaning than an exhaustion manifests. In the order of significations, Nancy writes, we are "left" the order of significations. Rather, we are exposed to the limit that such (ibid., 44). This completion does not mean that we have emerged from or tion becomes empty precisely because it completes [boucle] its subjective process" the subjective movement that has come full circle in its realization. "Significathat has come to an end. It has come to an end because it enclosed itself in speaks cannot be "overcome," if that means simply going beyond this exhausand the end of philosophy. But the exhaustion of significations of which Nancy tion, or producing new significations. It is the entire order of significations renounced 12) was developed against the background of the question of nihilism noted, appears only in a specific phase of his thought and which he eventually to discover other significations, but "to be only on the limit."13 haustion "nakedly," that is, as having to be reinvented: not reinvented in order Being-in-Common," Nancy writes that philosophy presents itself in this ex-This presentation is not the advent of a new signification. In his essay "Of its limit, to which philosophy must expose itself. In Nancy's words, the other tion, does not take place before, under, beyond, or after signification, but at exposure to the opening of meaning. Meaning, as that which exceeds significathought "presents itself in the very present of the exhaustion" (Gravity, 52). It is clear, then, that no return to past significations is possible, only an tence. The limit reveals the movement of a transcendence, if one understands place for the event of meaning, the event of transcendence itself, that is, exispass into," since "everything happens, on the contrary, on the limit" (Gravity, passing beyond the limit. For indeed, there is nowhere, no place, "nothing to transcendence to be not a passing beyond but a passing to the limit, a touching 70). Everything happens or takes place on the limit, because the limit is the But what can "thinking on the limit" mean? It first means to think without crossing, neither is there some place of immanence that would be overstepped of the limit. Second, if there is no beyond that would be reached after the expression à même-which could be rendered as "at the very level of," "right scendence of a being, but rather, of the being of a transcendence. To think on crossing over of the limit; rather, it is the being-exposed on the limit, at the the outset "brought" to this limit where it exists as transcendence. Transcenof the existent, as Nancy explains in The Experience of Freedom, is to be from Transcendence, in this sense, proves to be the truth of immanence. The "essence" for instance. In this "to" there already lies the transcendent relation to a self. being immanent is therefore always a being-immanent-to-something, to oneself "The Heart of Things (BP, 182), to that which "remains in itself [in-manere]"; Immanence means to remain within oneself; it refers, as Nancy reminds us in immanence that is not already split open by a movement of transcendence. before the stepping beyond. In a sense, there can be no separate sphere of outlast it, but is right at it. Meaning lies in its very exposure; it does not precede this exposure, does not an exposure, the fact that everything takes place à même, right at, this exposure does not imply a sameness or identity but simply designates the naked fact of place before, beneath, or beyond that to which it is related, but "at" it. This at," "right on," "in the same element as," or "immanent to," that is, not taking (transcendence) passing to the limit is conveyed by Nancy's frequent use of the This attempt to think a radical immanence to this movement of an existence there is nevertheless an immanence to transcendence that must be thought. indeed no place of immanence apart from the disruption of transcendence, dence, to "accompany," as it were, the movement of overstepping. If there is the limit would therefore be to think à même, right on this limit of transcenlimit and as limit" (EF, 29; trans. modified). It is not a question of the trandence, then, "is nothing other than the passage to the limit. It is not the

To think on the limit, then, means that there is no transcendent sphere beyond the limit, and no immanent sphere before the limit. It means, therefore, that thought has to be redefined in such a way that the traditional opposition between transcendence and immanence is exceeded. But this excess is just that, an excess, and it is consequently necessary that one start from this opposition in order to subvert it. Nancy's treatment of the transcendence-immanence doublet could be reconstituted in the following sequence. First, immanence is denied; there is no immanent being, by definition. An immanent being could not appear, could not relate to anything, because it would not have the space of transitivity that is constitutive of Being as such. All being is then situated outside, in transcendence. Second, and correlatively, transcendence cannot be said to be simple or pure exteriority. As Nancy explains in "Of Being-in-Common," a pure or absolute outside is a contradictory notion. Transcendence, then, is not what can be located in a sphere, but simply the movement of overstepping to which we are each time exposed. This is why, third, Nancy will speak of an immanence to transcendence, rendering the opposition ultimately untenable. For what this immanence to a transcendence reveals is nothing other than the very movement, trembling, or oscillation of the limit as such, along our exposure to it. The emphasis will then shift from the "in" of immanence to the "ex" of exteriority, and from that "ex" to the pure preposition of transitivity as such, the "to" (à). 14

nizes itself in its essential passivity and finitude. But this element of passivity on their indissociable relation.16 This, in turn, implies that thought recogbeing "capable" of meaning, or, as Nancy calls it, our being passible (passible) is not the simple opposite of activity. Rather, it is to be understood as our would thus be to remember this sense of wonder, and Nancy insists at length as the fundamental disposition for philosophizing.15 To remember philosophy this sense of wonder that ever since Plato and Aristotle has been recognized of meaning, in wonder. What is forgotten in the "forgetting of philosophy" is presents itself as new" (Gravity, 67). Finite thought welcomes this arrival at (of) the limit in wonder, for, "in the final analysis, wonder is nothing other ing significations, but in receiving, welcoming, and exposing itself to the event thought, once called back to its finitude, will not consist in giving or projectthan that which happens or arrives at the limit" (ibid., 67). The task of to touch the limit means that the limit arrives or happens to us, that "it always system or order of signification." Rather, the limit happens or arrives. In short, think the limit or on the limit cannot mean to appropriate it. For it is not up its pretensions to a total appropriation of meaning. Nancy shows that to sofar as it cannot appropriate the limit. Exposure is finitude itself. As that possible to "settle down on the limit," "hold on there as one could hold to a which is exposed to such an exposure, thought or philosophy will have to give the exposure of an exposure (exposure exposes itself)—is an exposure only in-This radical exposure to the limit-which is to be understood literally as

The term passible has the ordinary sense of "to be liable for," as in being liable for a crime, but Nancy plays on the fact that the word echoes passivite, thus emphasizing its contrast to the activity of the metaphysical project of giving signification. To be passible to meaning means to "suffer" or undergo the event of meaning. 17 The term is thus clearly employed in opposition to the subjectivist tradition in philosophy. Yet Nancy tries to conceive of a sense of passivity that would not simply be opposed to activity; this sense would designate the "activity" of receiving, as it were, of being affected by the event of conditions. It is thought as the irruption, or coming into presence, of presence of subjectivism). 18 Being neither a presentation based on "presentability" nor a constituted by a subject and as such evades or escapes desire (we have seen outside of the conditions of possibility provided for it by all the structures of representation or correspondence, truth does not have to be adjusted to any how Nancy situates the problematics of desire within the metaphysical horizon intentionality and all the projects of significations. Truth is not conditioned or meaning. This conflation disrupts the logic of signification, that is, the project tivity of which finite thought is capable is the activity of being passible to affected. It thus includes both passivity and activity. As receptive, it denotes a such, includes a certain "creativity," is then defined as the capacity of being [visée], but of letting the thing present itself 'in truth'" (Gravity, 55) itself. To this extent, "it is no longer a question of calibrating an intentionality the death of intention," Nancy develops the idea of a meaning that happens (will) of giving signification. Commenting upon Benjamin's phrase "Truth is tion, it implies an "active" participation in givenness itself. Yet the "only" acpassivity with respect to the givenness of what is given to it; but as a recepmeaning. Passibilité, not unlike the Kantian notion of receptivity, which, as

THE COMMONALITY OF MEANING

opens directly onto us. It designates us as its element and as the place of its open onto the void, any more than it infinitely tends toward its fulfillment. It event or advent" (Gravity, 65).19 once reveals the commonality of a "we": "But meaning as opening does not What we are passible to, in the final analysis, is the event of meaning, which at

us. This pre-egoistic, pre-subjective, and even pre-intersubjective being calls simply the being of an exposure; we are exposed, and this exposure constitutes to come, would be developed on the basis of the collapse of traditional ontologies for what Nancy names an ontology "of the common." Such an ontology, yet exposure to meaning. We are not the substantiality of a pregiven identity, but mon element that would designate the very opening of a we, understood as an or humanistic significations, we are (ek-sist) in the element of meaning, a comthis we on the basis of a sheer access to meaning. Prior to any anthropological commonality of a we, indeed talks of the I as a we. He attempts to conceive of develop the consequences of such an inclusion radically enough.20 It is therefore significant that Nancy derives the possibility of the singular I from the the existentiale Being-with, one could argue, as Nancy does, that he did not individual Dasein. Even if Heidegger did include in the definition of Dasein issue here, not simply what Heidegger referred to as the I, or the Self, or the Nancy will always refer to the being-plural of this self. It is a we that is at > proached through Nancy's thought of comparation. mon than to be, than being?" (CLE, 1). This ontology of the common is apthere is no Being that is not common. "What," he asks, "can be more comontology of the common is ontology per se, and not some branch of it. Ontolguished from all ontology of substance, order and origin" (C, 57). In fact, this the common, for Being itself is Being-in-common. Indeed, as Nancy insists, ogy itself, the science of Being as such, is to be elaborated as an ontology of "would be nothing other than the ontology of 'Being' when radically distin-"The ontology of the common and of 'sharing," he writes in La comparation, an appearance [apparence]" (IC, 28). pearing. Nancy is quite clear on this point: "This appearing [apparaître] is not appearance, but of appearing. There is nothing that appears, but there is apsarily refers to something that appears.²² But for Nancy there is nothing bea coming into presence. An appearance, as Kant noted, is a notion that neceshind the singular being that appears; this is why it is a question not of an appearance," because Nancy seeks to use the term in the active, verbal sense of a "co-appearing." We render comparation by "co-appearing," rather than "cohe also seeks to give it the more literal sense of a "co-appearance" or, better, to answer and in which we are judged (in and by the krinein of the crisis). Yet thinks comparation in terms of an exposure to a present for which we have before the law,"21 and the word retains this sense here to the extent that Nancy is ordinarily used to refer to a "court appearance," as in "to appear [comparaître] paraître (to appear), parution, and the prefix com- (with). The term comparution Comparation is a term formed on the basis of the nominal form of the verb oneself as an Other. The existing I presents or manifests itself to an alterity this "for" has the sense of a before: before the law, before an Other, and before exposed, abandoned, delivered over, but also subjected: One appears for, and that is, every existence, is opened and exposed. One appears, that is, one is precisely because it takes place, in a certain "spaciousness" in which everything. thrown into the element of exteriority. Everything takes place outside (appears) ing of the singular being opens exteriority. To appear is to be exposed, to be movement of an existence, that is, of a transcendence. This existential appearpearing, so much Being.24 Appearing is thus related directly to the ek-static each time, "out there." One might say, to paraphrase Heidegger: so much apedly, is without essence, it is the essence-less itself. In this respect, Being canonly be put into play each time as existence. 23 Existence, as he writes repeatnot take place save in its very existing, that is, in the way in which it ek-sists, thought of Being, which for him is existence itself, in the sense that Being can mon, that is, as a co-appearing-must be approached on the basis of Nancy's This dimension of appearing—which, as we will see, must be taken as com-

that Being is not common in the sense of a common property, but that it is in common."²⁵ How are we to understand this claim? coming-together into the world. To be means to be-with, constitutively: "We Being is not a thing that we could possess in common. . . . We shall say then ing-in-Common" as follows: "Being, or existence, is what we share.... But therefore there is Being-in-common. Nancy expresses this in his essay "On Bebeing-in-common. One might go so far as to say: there is no common being, commonality. As he often puts it, there is no common being, but there is ever, most paradoxical, for Nancy presents it as arising from a withdrawal of = being-in-common" (C, 53). The commonality of being-in-common is, howworld that is not radically common: the 'common' itself. Coming into the world co-appear: we come into the world together. . . . There is no coming into the stood in the most radical way: appearing, coming into the world, is always a means to co-appear. This commonality, as suggested above, should be underan appearing that is indissociable from an exposure to others; to appear always "nowhere to hide." This is why coming into the world has to be understood as place of immanence for the I, no "inside" to inhabit, no retreat to go back to, or sameness that would subsequently expose itself to an exteriority. There is no (including its "own" alterity), it does not constitute some sphere of "ownness"

negation of otherness and, therefore, of Being-with.²⁷ Nancy's community is a cause the appearing of the existing I already constitutes the disruption or Others themselves, and not only the individual Dasein, that vanish. Heidegge gated" to the Others. Yet one should note that in such a subjugation it is the As we know, in such an identification, the individual self has been "subjulence, since, in this mode of existence, the I and Others are, as it were, "one." "one," could be said to be the immanentist version of Being-with par excelis the other, and no one is himself" (BT, 165/128). The They, or the neutral there is a peculiar identification between the self and others in which "everyone stood on the model of that celebrated figure, Heidegger's das Man, in which is woven of and into transcendence. This is why Being-with cannot be underresolutely transcendent community, better, a community of transcendence: it singular or collective, but also because an immanentist model amounts to a transcendence of any immanence (for nothing can subsist within itself), whether fication, substitution, "incorporation," communion, or fusion), not only beunderstood through what Nancy calls an "immanentist" model (one of identiabsorbed in an encompassing whole. Togetherness in community cannot be above all not a community of essence, through which singularities would be have governed representations of togetherness, or community. Community is ultimately radicalizing it), 26 Nancy begins by rejecting the classical models that Following up to a certain point the Heideggerian thinking of Mitsein (and > in particular, in fact, "nothing definite" (ibid., 164/127). individuation, too, is closed off, for the They, as Heidegger explains, is properly otherness itself that is closed off in the so-called dictatorship of the They. But and more" (ibid., 164/126; emphasis added). It is therefore the dimension of such a way, indeed, that the Others, as distinguishable and explicit, vanish more solves one's own Dasein completely into the kind of Being of 'the Others,' in "nobody" (ibid., 166/128). "Nobody" means: neither me nor you nor anyone is quite explicit on this point: "This [everyday] Being-with-one-another dis-

this "system" of communication is what makes up the whole.
What matters here is that this "interruption" of community represents the a fabric is déchirée, it remains one, albeit in pieces. Those pieces still "communicate," as it were, through the holes that separate them from one another, and stance, ibid., 6), would not absolutely separate the elements it sets apart. When which Nancy designates by the significant metaphor of the dechirure (for insimple dissociation. The rupture in, of, or as community, this "tearing apart, nity. The commonality in question here resists community, and Nancy "situates" others. It would thus also represent the negation of the possibility of commuown, in an absolute or monadic separation, in short, in a Being-withoutit in what he calls a "dis-location" (IC, 25),29 which is not the same as a pure and one-another."28 That would imply that the singular being could exist on its others would be simply juxtaposed, as if Being-with were a "being-alongside-"together" in the sense of being in one another's place) does not signify that of Being-with (the fact that Being-with excludes the possibility of being implicit recognition of a certain interruption or disruption that lies at the basis one that would prevent its collapse into the fantasy of immanence. And yet the some sense of difference, some "resistance," in the very fabric of community, singularities involved in such Being-with. It is therefore necessary to preserve fication implies the very negation of alterity, of Being-with as such, and of the is the case to the extent that the sense of Being-with as communion or identision preventing communion is essential to the possibility of community. This Nancy retains from this Heideggerian analysis the insight that a certain ten-suggests just this in The Inoperative Community when he writes that "Dasein's and that "it is this implication that remains to be thought."30 It is perhaps authentic of the relation to the Other, because it is, as Heidegger put it, "nonrelational" death, or Being-toward-death-precisely because it represents the interruption should be reconsidered in its constitutive implications for Being-with. Nancy being-toward-death' was never radically implicated in its being-with—in Missein, immanent Being-with becomes the very possibility of co-appearing. This is why possibility of Being-with. Interruption, as Nancy states ("Myth Interrupted," IC, 61), is the very law of co-appearing. In such a logic, the interruption of an infinity of this withdrawal—in this sense, without any relation, and therefore thrown into relation" (ibid., 68; trans. modified).

dered otherwise than by using the two terms: "we share that which divides us." expression we cited earlier, nous partageons ce qui nous partage, cannot be renunless the context clearly emphasizes one of the two senses. For example, the that the reader may hear both the divisive and the inclusive senses in the term, sion "sharing out," and we render the verbal form, partager, "to share out" so with one locution. We thus attempt to capture this ambiguity with the expresa sharing and a separation. This is why we believe it important to render it be shared, that is, the sharing of singularities. It points to the undecidability of is, the lot that each of us has in common—our share. Partage thus designates sion notre partage, the term indicates something like "our common lot," that something, we necessarily also divide it. For instance, when used in the expresthe paradoxical concept of a community based on the sharing of what cannot common usage says something of this paradoxical indissociability; in sharing terms: divide and share. Yet an essential feature of Nancy's thought of partage lies in the fact that it indicates at once a separation and a sharing. Indeed, This explains why another practice has been to translate the term by using two inadequate in that it does not capture the commonality the word also implies. to render partage by "partition" or "parturition." But this translation is equally This is why some translators, in order to capture this latter sense, have opted partage (as well as the title's play on words: the parting of the ways [voies]). this translation misses the essentially distributive quality that Nancy exploits in partage des voix was rendered as "Sharing Voices." Although partly accurate, sharing, it has been most frequently translated as "sharing"; for example, Le ticipation, separation, communication, discord, split, devolution, destination. While it has been rightly noted that partage signifies both a division and a proposed no less than ten senses of the term: "partition, repartition, part, pardiscuss shortly, already has a long history in Nancy's thought.33 Nancy recently of partage. Partage, which we translate as "sharing out" for reasons we shall This singular logic of a relation/nonrelation is developed in Nancy's though

The task is thus to account for a community that paradoxically depends upon the interruption of all relations. There is a Being-in-common, a co-appearing, in the very disruption of commonality, in the gap that separates singularities and interrupts community. One would have to think the very possibility of a relation-to on the basis of such an interruption. As Nancy writes: "Instead of closing it in, this interruption once again exposes singularity to its limit, which is to say, to other singularities" (IC, 60). One would have to hold together these two theses: on the one hand, relation, the very possibility of a relation, lies in the interruption of any relation; and, on the other hand, the singularity of such an inoperative community thus comes to the fore in the following singularity—ipseity is itself constituted by and as sharing" (EF, 70). The enigma from everything; but it is just as true (and "irreducible"), Nancy continues, total, that it is nothing if it is not the independence of a singular being cut off of Being-with," which amounts to saying that "the Other can be missing only so much with others. Heidegger explains that "Being-alone is a deficient mode us" (nous partageons ce qui nous partage), which we find in many places in is singular. Indeed, the meaning of the expression "we share that which divides with, thereby freeing the possibility of a community that is based on resistance, other words, authentic Being-toward-death only interrupts inauthentic Beingcommon before the withdrawal of their common being, spaced apart by the passage: "Singularities have no common being, but they co-appear each time in that "in solitude and even in solipsism—at least understood as a sola ipsa of Experience of Freedom: it is true, he concedes, that solitude, as such, must be in and for a Being-with" (BT, 157/120). Nancy makes this very point in The Nancy's texts, can only be the following: as alone, as totally alone, I am never the dimension of the other but simply states that, as Being-with-others, Dascin as such, since the affirmation of Dasein's existential solipsism does not negate an "existential solipsism" turns out to constitute the possibility of being-with indeed, that is resistance.32 This is why, paradoxically, Heidegger's notion of the possibility of substitution, that is, an inauthentic mode of Being-with. In anticipation of its own death does not dissolve the dimension of the other; and through them" (GA 26, p. 240). On the other hand, Dasein's authentic dial, if not more "authentic." However, Nancy shows quite pertinently the often claim that Heidegger's thinking of death in Being and Time is essentially of the other (in Nancy's terms, insofar as it interrupts the immanence of comrather, what is dissolved in such a mode of existence—the authentic mode—is "metaphysical ground of the possibility" that Dasein be "with others, for them, physical Foundations of Logic, that Dasein's Being-for-the-sake-of-oneself is the being for the sake of others. Heidegger explains in his 1928 course, The Metabeing for the sake of one's own being is simultaneously and indissociably a Dasein, no property of oneself that is not partagee, "shared out." Consequently, insufficiency of this representation. On the one hand, there is no "ownness" of dying for oneself a dying-for-others that would in some sense be more primorfor-the-sake-of-one's-self, a Being-for-the-sake-of-others,31 and to the solipsistic They often support this claim by opposing to Dasein's care, that is, to Beingindividualistic or solipsistic, and that it obliterates the dimension of the other. munity)—that is the basis for Being-with, for any community. Commentators can die my death for me, as well as the impossibility for me to die the death Being-toward-death itself-the anticipation of my death insofar as no one else of the finite being lies in the relation-to-another. Being-with would then designate the paradoxical simultaneity of a rapport sans rapport, a relation without relation.

which can be rendered as "each particular while," as "temporal specificity," appears prominently in Being and Time, was preceded by that of Jeweiligkeit, scansion: It is not accidental that the term Jemeinigkeit, or "mineness," which scansion or "syncope" of an "each." Starting from Heidegger's statement in everything, but each time [fois], as a time [fois] (the strike and cut [coup et time, it is thrown into relation with others, it is a mit-Dasein. The logic of the singular, each time cut and separated by the discrete scansion of this each why the singularity delineated by the syncope of the each time "is immediately bled: the now as limit of the before, the now as limit of the after.36 This is boundary or limit, has itself the structure of an interval, and is therefore douinterval." As Aristotle pointed out in his treatise on time, the now itself, as stressing its temporally distributive sense.35 The each time of Jemeinigkeit or claimed, Dasein's mineness must be thought on the basis of such a temporal the I is an I because of the constitutive effects of this each time. As Heidegger does not mean that the I accompanies its representations each time. Rather, the singularity of the existent, its "mineness," originates or is constituted from peculiar logic on the basis of a reflection on the constitutive effects of the continuous relation is withdrawn from them" (ibid., 67). coupe] of existence) opens itself as a relation to other times, to the extent that in [the] relation" (EF, 67). Because Dasein is each time its own, each time the cutting edge of this "each time." Indeed, that Dasein is each time mine Being and Time that Dasein is each time mine (je meines), Nancy shows how "each" constitutes the Being-with of the self: "Each time, it cuts itself off from Jeweiligkeit interrupts any continuum; it has, says Nancy, "the structure of an In a beautiful passage from The Experience of Freedom, Nancy elaborates this

The each time at once dislocates and constitutes both singularity and community. Singularity follows the dislocating effect of the relation; the "each" institutes the relation as a withdrawal of identity and institutes commonality as a withdrawal of communion. Nancy here makes explicit what compelled Heidegger to posit the co-extensiveness of Being-with and Being-one's-self. This is why the very term "relation" is ultimately inadequate to designate the co-extensiveness of Being-in-common and Being-one's-self. This co-extensiveness means, certainly, that Being-in-common is not a dimension added to an otherwise isolated self. But it means, above all, that the self, as such, is exhausted in the relation-to-another, in the "with" of Being-with. The self does not simply stand in relation, it is that very relation. The self is the "in" of Being-in-common. This is why the task is to think this relation in terms of the between of singularities, the relation/nonrelation indicated by the "with" of Being-with, or the "in" of Being-in-common. In the expression "Being-in-common," in indicates, as Nancy explains in The Inoperative Community, the very between of "you and I (between us)" (IC, 29). Singularities are constituted in this "between": only in this co-appearing, or communication, "are singular beings given" (ibid., 29). This co-extensiveness defines the singular being, whose being, therefore, lies only in an exposure

"the unicity of the singular consists very exactly in its multiplicity" (SM, 116). is by itself a plural. Each time is, as such, another time" (ibid., 67). In short, singularities. What is common lies only in this "each time." The singular is gular, that is, unique, it would absorb all other beings and, therefore, would the plural, as "singularities." There is no single singularity. If Being were sinral, or better, the singular as plural. Indeed, singularity can only be written in cutting edge of the "each" simultaneously constitutes the singular and the pluway can take place" (ibid., 62). The I itself, as I, lies in a "we."38 Co-appearcommon element of meaning in which alone that which takes place in this thought as plural, and this, as singularity: "One could say: the singular of 'mine' plural and the plural is singular each time. 39 The singularity of the each must be (EF, 67). Rather, all there is is singularity, which means that there are only not be singular. Nancy writes, "If there is just one time, there is never 'once'" from the plural undecidable. In the rupture that shares out singularities, the ing, as the exposition of the between, renders the separation of the singular a presentation (it is 'collective' only in a secondary and derivative way) and the each of our singular existences, whose singularity is each time the place of such why, concludes Nancy, when "I say 'we' . . . I designate equally and indissociably 'singularities' and our 'community'" (Gravity, 64; emphasis added). This is ing at once their difference and indissociability; they are all shared out, partages. to none-not belonging to itself, either" (ibid., 6), that Nancy often writes Philosophy, Nancy speaks of "the simultaneous and undecidable reference to our This logic manifests and accounts for an undecidable. In The Forgetting of singular/common, I/we, unique/multiple, in one sequence,37 thereby designatthe individual and community. It is on the basis of this logic "of the limit," side, I and we, singularities and community, outside the opposition between Such a logic would articulate the relation/nonrelation between outside and inwhich is concerned with "what is between two or several, belonging to all and logic, which Nancy calls "the very logic of singularity in general" (CLE, 6). the "in" of Being-in-common, the "with" of Being-with, all call for a specific the juxtaposed elements indifferent to one another, the "co" of co-appearing, Neither an encompassing identity nor a mere exteriority that would leave

It should become apparent at this point that the concept of singularity is itself transformed and radically distinguished from the traditional notion of singularities-already constituted identities-that would then enter into a relamately refer Being-in-common to an individualistic pole. In fact, the individual "existence as together and with one another is founded on the genuine is the Dasein authentically free and open for the thou," and that, consequently, rather traditional emphasis on the individual (for example, in Basic Problems of rather, it comes from the Other (which is not in turn another identity but is scendent movement of co-appearing does not go from the I to the Other; in the final analysis, only a boundary of community."42 This is why the tranconstitutive of individuality, rather than the reverse, and individuality is perhaps mutation and communication of the 'I.' Community and communication are singularity, because, as Nancy writes, individuality is ultimately nothing but a munication. What we call individuality should be conceived on the basis of individual. In contrast to individuality, singularity is constituted through comopposed to community. This is why it is not simply another term for the concepts of autonomy and individuality collapse. In short, singularity is not there is no singularity outside of such a relation to other singularities, the tween singularities, or the very between of singularities. To the extent that because community, as we saw, is nothing but the relation/nonrelation becedes singularities. Community is rigorously contemporaneous with singularities, them others" (IC, 25; trans. modified). This is not to say that community prethat "are distributed and placed, or rather spaced, by the sharing out that makes tities) as shared out, that is, that "are themselves constituted by sharing out," tion with other singularities: there are singularities (not individualities or identhe communication (and not communion) of its being. There are not, first, itself cannot be conceived in such a thought without its "differential" place in individuation of the individual"),41 Nancy's, on the contrary, does not ultiindividuality. 40 For while Heidegger's analysis could be said to end up with a elsewhere than to me": back to me. Transcendence, like love itself, is a "coming and going" that "goes leaving me aside, ex-centered. It does not come from me and it does not come me, it still does not stop at me. It continues through me, cutting through and Other-to-itself). Yet while coming from the Other, and while happening to limit or a boundary of community: "In each case, 'I' am not before this com-Phenomenology, he maintains that "only from and in its resolute individuation

What is offered by transcendence, or as transcendence, is this arrival and this departure, this incessant coming-and-going.... Exposed to arrival and to departure, the singular being is traversed by the alterity of the other, which does not stop or fix itself anywhere, neither in "him," nor in "me," because it is nothing other than the coming-and-going. The other comes and cuts across me, because it leaves for the other. ("Shattered Love," IC, 98)

of the proper. and to others" (IC, 66). Being-in-common as such takes place as the de-propriation and "consequently everyone's nonidentity, each one's nonidentity to himself sharing out itself-that is, the absence of any identity. We share sharing out, 62). What is shared is, as he says in "Myth Interrupted," nothing other than existence, that is, the absence of any common being. The common, what is in exteriority that is beyond appropriation. What is shared is the singularity of "transcends 'in me'" (IC, 97). Community is nothing but the exposure of singularities to each other. This co-appearing frustrates any appropriation into through one another, and each one to him or herself. We co-appear" (Gravity, "We present ourselves to ourselves. That is to say, at once to one another, is not a common identity, not even that of our nonidentity. As Nancy puts it, common, is the very absence or lack of any common substance; what is shared an essence or common identity because it takes place only in an exposure to an other than itself; this is precisely, as Nancy puts it in "Shattered Love," what rather, the I is altered through and through, in the Other, which "itself" is others" (BP, 155). The I does not face another as an ego faces an alter ego; exteriority, having to do with an outside in the very intimacy of an inside" (ibid., xxxvii), and this, to such an extent that, as Nancy puts it, "We are writes: "'To be exposed' means to be 'posed' in exteriority, according to an and through. The otherness to which the I is exposed alters the I itself. Nancy archi-original impossibility of Narcissus"[!], IC, xxxviii), affects the I through inside. This ex-posure, or positing-outside (which represents for Nancy "the thereby exposing it as outside, or better yet, as the limit of the outside and the other is not the terminus of the transcendent exposure, nor is it sublated in some reappropriating return; rather, it pierces immanence through and through, that neither unfolds out of a pregiven immanent being nor returns to one. The the community of others" (BC, 155). Being-in-common lies in an exposure scendence of community to the extent that, as Nancy writes, "Community is going, the tracing of "an intersection of limits on which there is an exposure," Singularity, then, would be the very trace of this movement of coming-and flected. The Being-in-common of our singular beings lies only in the tranthe relation to the other is projected and back to which this relation is rethe sheer "point of an exposure," (CLE, 7), not an individual pole from which

This exposure to an inappropriable is understood by Nancy in terms of materiality under the names of "weight," "heaviness," or "gravity." What weight is precisely this inappropriable, the impact or shock that the event of meaning imparts to thought, the "communication" of the momentum of meaning. It is the exposure to the inappropriable limit of significations that weighs upon thought. Thought, then, will have to be redefined as that which bears the weight of what weighs, and to that extent, as a weighing. As Nancy writes: "Thought weighs exactly the weight of meaning" (Gravity, 77). "Weighs" has here two senses, which we cannot choose between: the act of measuring the weight of meaning and thought's being itself weighed down by that weight.

THE MATERIALITY OF EXISTENCE

aesthetics of gravity" (Gravity, 77). These expressions, near oxymorons, indicate from the outset that the thematics of weight and materiality cannot be and immateriality, reality and ideality. By speaking of the weight of thought, will also attempt to complicate the traditional oppositions between materiality sentation, and so on. Yet in his emphasis on the materiality of thought, Nancy understood from the perspective of a simple materialism, and that therefore 171), a "hyletic reduction" (ibid., 159). Here, it is called a "transcendental logical materiality" (EF, 103), a "mineralogy and a meteorology of being" (BP, what he has called at times (rather enigmatically) a "transcendental" or "onto-Thought," should be taken in the context of Nancy's attempt to articulate short and remarkably dense essay included in this volume, "The Weight of a theme of weight has a certain insistence (if not "weight") in his work. The As Nancy himself reminds us in his Introductory Remarks to this volume, the simultaneously the bare outline of a logic and the thickness of a flesh" (Gravity, reality that is undiscernibly and simultaneously empirical and transcendental ting of Philosophy, for instance, he claims that "the element of meaning is a Nancy in fact manifests the undecidability of these oppositions. In The Forgetthought with a certain immateriality or ideality: that of meaning, ideas, repreof the essay already suggests a distance taken with the traditional association of the facticity which is here introduced will have to be redefined. The very title might distinguish the materiality of weighing from the immateriality of thought of matter? The "matter" cannot be resolved, for the measure with which one tantamount to reaffirming a materialism of meaning, or rather an intelligibility the "force of attraction" between two bodies and the "seriousness" of a situation. In the essay "The Weight of a Thought," Nancy begins by destabilizing 60). The very term "gravity" is itself such an undecidable; it bespeaks at once gest something like "an unprecedented kind of 'fact of reason' that would manifest material and ideational, physical and spiritual," admitting that this would sugwhat is proper to thinking and to weighing, to thinking as much as to weighing, is struck with an irreducible undecidability. Nancy writes, "Who could say into the vocabulary of weight, gravity, heaviness, and weighing. Is this gesture the ideality/materiality opposition, translating the ideal categories of thinking thus being properly neither? ... Who could weigh, and on what scales, the materiality' of weighing, on the one hand, and the 'immateriality' of thought on the other? On what unit of weight, on what law of gravity [pesanteur], would such an operation be based?" (Gravity, 75). Precisely because these two senses cannot be absolutely disentangled, speaking of a weight of thought is in no way metaphorical. Thinking is really, literally, a weighing. It weighs the weight of the real as meaning. In fact, the issue is to think the materiality of the ideality of thought. As Nancy explains in Le sens du monde, "The ideality of meaning is indissociable from its materiality" (SM, 96).

what weighs is the responsibility of having to exercise this freedom. always "to be done," that is, to the pure obligation of Being. In this respect. is that we are delivered over to what is never a simple fact but to what remains ble from the event of presence, that is, from freedom. Yet the fact of freedom that actual, existent 'what,' as it exists, a factual (even material) punctuation of and in fact, 'hic et nunc.' . . . Every 'what' that exists is a 'who,' if 'who' means: plural "there is" of Being itself, which is always a material, factual "here." Existence, Nancy writes, "is the essence whose essence it is to exist, actually and-now of Being itself collapses the opposition between the "who" and the a there, the fact or Being-there of a thing. "To exist is a here-and-now of a singular event that, each time, is indissociable from the occurence of a this, as the materiality or weight of one's own presence. Being, as we have seen, is Being" (WCAS, 6-7, emphasis added). This actuality, or factuality, is insepara-"what" (the Da of human Dasein and the place of things) into the singular/ Being, it is to be a here-and-now of Being" (SM, 36). This thinking of a hereexposed, then it cannot but take place as a fact, one that demands to be thought it is not free-floating but occurs right in the midst of things, if it exists only as of the existent, a law of Being. The very conception of existence as essence-less to be referred back to Nancy's thought of existence, for materiality is an existentiale of materiality, not entirely distinct from the mere factuality of the thing, 43 has necessitates a thematic of weight and gravity. If existence is without essence, if real, worldly existence, an existence that has its place in media rei. This sense materiality itself. It is here understood as the materiality of a factual, corpo-Yet it is not only the ideality of thought that must be reformulated, but

It is no accident that the theme of weight appears in Heidegger's Being ana Time whenever it is a question of Dasein's facticity, the fact of being-thrown. Existence is felt as a weight or burden insofar as I am thrown into it; being thrown in the midst of things manifests the essential passivity and materiality of existence. Yet I am not thrown, as Sartre believed, into an inert materiality (the "in-itself"). Materiality is not here the absolute opacity of the stone, but, as we alluded above, a "transcendental," "ontological," even "differential" materiality that qualifies the singularity of the finite being. As Nancy explains in Le sens du monde, "Matter is not first an immanent thickness absolutely closed in itself, existence itself, as I have to assume it, here, now, each time. More precisely, situation of having to appropriate this absence of ground. This is what weighs: existence as a "for-itself" would face and negate, at once fascinated and resibility of an archi-original ethics. As Levinas reminds us in Time and the Other, Obligation is the very form of Being, for Being means having-to-be. Ontologiam therefore thrown into the obligation of my being, into Being as obligation. existence is felt as a weight because I am thrown into it as having to be it. delivered over to an existence that, because it has no ground, puts me in the why facticity or factuality does not pertain strictly to some inert matter that "reality of difference . . . by which alone there is (are) some thing(s)" (ibid., 96). but, quite to the contrary, the very difference by which some thing is possible" thrown into existence and having to make it one's own.44 but is that which is brought by responsibility, that is, by the fact of being materiality itself is not what bodies lend to an otherwise weightless existence. cal materiality is here tantamount to the possibility of responsibility, the postherefore thrown into a possibility, a sheer freedom, in the sense that I am pulsed, but is rather a trait of the existent itself and its very freedom. I am Materiality is ultimately the materiality of the "there is (something)." This is (SM, 95). In other words, matter is not the pure identity of the thing, but the prevented its completion, as if existence's absence of ground were a mere lack that is, in answering to and for oneself as the existing of existence. Finitude is of an essence, but strictly in answering to and for the fact that there is being, existence 'understands' that 'being' does not consist in resting upon the basis tion; such is the finitude of existence. Nancy writes, "Finitude consists in that ditionally in terms of guilt, debt, lack, fault, etc.), and the necessity of obligainappropriable for it. Therein lies the possibility of responsibility (thought tra-The weight of existence lies in the fact that there is something that remains plains, "is what is also called, in another vocabulary, finitude" (Gravity, 78). projects. It opens the question of finitude: the weight of thought, Nancy exden"). This guilt manifests the very inappropriability that inhabits all "my" expressions "to carry a responsibility on one's shoulder," to "shoulder a bur-Heidegger explains, essentially responsible or guilty, I am schuldig (hence the as it were, to recapture the ground of my being. To this extent, I am, as the negative sense, however, as if existence were coming up against limits that inappropriable of existence. This inappropriable should not be understood in is to remember this weight, that is, the responsibility of answering for the the responsibility of meaning, absolutely" (PF, 26-27). To remember philosophy absolutely realized; rather, it lacks nothing, positively, and is therefore "abso-Existence, Nancy often stresses, lacks nothing. It is not for all that complete or Yet I can never appropriate this "own-ness," I can never leap behind myself > not close or complete, lets the thing weigh with its weight. Remaining end, finitude lies in the exposure that existence is, one that, because it does remains "inappropriated in its appropriation" (ibid., 81) is what weighs. In the thought" (ibid., 79). Thought is passible to this outside. thought is then the weight of the thing insofar as that thing weighs outside of inappropriable and excessive, the thing weighs for thought. "The weight of writes Nancy, "is the appropriation of the inappropriable" (ibid., 80). What no negativity or negation, in short, no negative thought of finitude. Existence, existence, or existence itself, the pure existing of the singular existent. There is with the event of presence, not the privation of Being; it is the "essence" of stead toward a "positive" or "proper" sense of finitude. 45 Finitude has to do sense of the incomplete, the aborted, the failed" (Gravity, 81), and points in-48). Finitude is not the privation of the infinite, as an entire theological and that which is not-infinite, as "the badly-finished and the not-finished in the philosophical tradition had believed. Nancy rejects the sense of the finite as lutely detached from all completion, from all infinite senseless closure" (PF, relativity, which implies the Absolute, but a thought of absolute finitude: absois the absoluteness of finitude. A finite thought is therefore "not a thought of Setzung, or "hecceity" of finite existence, Being-there. The finitude of existence ground-into the thing. Existence is supported neither by a ground nor by a lack of ground. This is why the absence of ground is the absolute positing, for Nancy: the withdrawal of the cause, principle, basis, ratio—in short, the there is no ground for it to lack. This in fact is the very definition of freedom privation of nothing" (SM, 54). The absence of ground that is existence in its lutely," or wholly, finite. "Lacking nothing, yet still lacking: that is existing" (ibid., 26). Existence may be deprived of its essence, but "this privation is the freedom is the lack of nothing: there is nothing that it lacks precisely because

We have already alluded to the implication of the theme of weight in Nancy's attempt to approach thought in terms of "passibility," that is, in opposition to the activity of the so-called thoughts of giving significations. Indeed, if thought is no longer understood as spontaneity (according to Kant's definition of the understanding), then it is affected by an otherness that exceeds the simple appropriation of thought. Because existence is ex-posed to an alterity, the very possibility of appropriation is put into question. Weight would thus be the "resistance" of what remains inappropriable. The fact that thought receives the shock of meaning, or registers the "shock of the thing," and, to that extent, requires "strength, work, effort and rigor" (Gravity, 70)—in a word, "activity"—does not prevent it from remaining "passive" through and through. This passibility makes itself felt as a weight; its "activity" is one of weighing, if it is understood that weighing does not mean here the act of measuring and giving significations but, more radically, the "act" of "letting what weighs weigh" (ibid., 67). This is ultimately what weighs: the fact of being exposed to what thought receives, to what remains inappropriable for it. This reception has the sense of inscribing or registering a reality foreign to the order of signification without making it homogeneous to that order. In this sense, that inscription should be written, as Nancy suggests, as "ex-scription," thereby preserving a certain excess or inappropriability in the very gesture of writing. Nancy names this peculiar exposure of thought to the inappropriability of meaning "figure":

xxxii / TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE

On this account, a figure would be the entire weight of a thought: its way, not of "thinking" meaning (of elaborating its signification) but of letting it weigh, just as it comes, just as it passes away, heavy or light, and always at the same time heavy and light. Are we (we who keep saying to ourselves that we arrive so late, so much at the end), in the end, going to let ourselves be presented with this constantly renewed gravity? Are we—with difficulty and serenity—going to let ourselves simply exist? (Gravity, 82)

François Raffoul

Acknowledgments

Our sincere thanks to Hugh Silverman for his support of this project from its earliest stages. David Allison's counsel was very helpful in the translation of difficult passages. We are particularly grateful to Michael Naas and Pascale-Anne Brault for their careful attention to the final manuscript, and would also like to acknowledge the participants in a reading group on Jean-Luc Nancy's work that took place in the spring of 1994 in the Philosophy Department at the State University of New York-Stony Brook: Boris Belay, Bram Briggance, Edward Casey, Steven Corinth, Irene Klaver, Andrew Mitchell, and Malek Moazzam-Doulat. Finally, we would like to thank Katherine Binhammer for her telling comments on the preface.

Gravity: Introductory Remarks

Why publish these two texts together, The Forgetting of Philosophy and "The Weight of a Thought"? The first was a short book written in particular circumstances: I wanted to protest against a kind of simplistic dismissal, in the name of a "return" to the Enlightenment and humanism, of the most pointed demands of contemporary thought. The second was a preface to a collection of texts whose concerns were rather unzetigemäss (heedless of the spirit of the times). The five years that separate these two texts do not in themselves constitute a significant distance. But I had not, in my recollection, put them on the same level. Reading them again, I realize that the first ended in large part with the theme of the weight of thought. I had forgotten this. (I generally forget most of what I write. I always feel that I am being carried off once again by a new urgency, which would somehow owe nothing to the previous one. In fact, I have to admit that I am always retracing my steps, as do we all.)

As for the polemical aspect of the first text, it is hardly necessary to press it further; it has to a large extent lost its raison d'être. Those who once believed they could dismiss a whole mode of thought that some called "poststructuralist," and others "postmodern," have become much more discreet. They are obliged to recognize that the situation is more serious [grave] or more joyous (it is the same thing) than they cared to admit. It has turned out that the old formulas were, quite simply, old. And that, as a result, one must think with one's times, and not as if we were in 1775 or in 1820. I will not dwell on this any further: everyone can determine what is past and what is not, as well as what remains to come.

What intrigued me was the theme of weight. Why does this theme persist, in these two texts, but also elsewhere? Why does it function for me as an "obsessive metaphor"? In fact, I have to admit it, there is something in it that obsesses me-I might just as well say: something that weighs on me it is lourd de conséquences.2 One speaks as well of a "weighty silence." concerns me. To think, or to want to think, is heavy. As one says in French, ward the earth, that bends me, tires me, and something that troubles me, that This means at once: something that weighs me down, that pushes me to-carry it: we are this weight. other conditions). This said, we all carry this weight. Or, rather, we do not tion of everyone, the human condition (assuming that we know anything about there is no "condition of the thinker." On the contrary, thinking is the condi-"thinker" is a heavy one, certainly not! And this for the simple reason that There is no pathos here: I certainly do not say that the condition of the

ing or abyss, outside of oneself. Weight means to fall outside of oneself. oneself, in having one's being or essence outside of oneself, in having one's landing point or place of presence, one's earth, ground, or void, one's belong-What, then, is this weight? In general, weight consists in being outside of la pensée, Paris: Scuil, 1993, p. 377). antees that these things reveal no secret but that of being there" (Le Tempo de not gather, but to a logos that maintains the heterogeneous and discreetly guarbeautifully: "Hard things . . . are mute, yet they call you to a logos that does is quite enough). It is a calm and opaque hardness. Patrice Loraux has said this diloquence or melodrama here: a good shot that hits hard, that is all, yet that neither a dizziness nor an intoxication but, indeed, a violent shock (no granfalls outside of itself even before having been a self. And what is then felt is Thinking is presumably nothing other than the sensation of a "self" that the Being-there of things insofar as they are hard. Insofar as they are grave. "thinking" means: the "hardness" of things insofar as they are "there," and also Now, all there remains to be thought is this: hard things are there. Or else whose very object (or very subject) is this infinite resistance. being itself divided between to think of and to think or thinking, absolutely)is nothing other than that against which an infinite resistance is opposed and tible the gap between the substantive thought and the verb to think, the latter What we call "thought"—or "to think" (the English language makes percep-divided in two.) what or whose hardness hurts him, and he draws his perverse pleasure from joys [jouit] and suffers without any representation, and in a single movement this representation. But there is nothing perverse in "thinking." Thinking enthe only difference being that the masochist has a precise representation of (One might say, with good reason, "thinking" is masochism par excellence,

This means: insofar as they resist thought; this is how they make it think . .

Thought: the infinite return into itself of an exteriority that has been originarily torn from itself, and to such an extent that it was preceded by no self.

exists without any other justification than existing. As is also said in French: ça tombe sous le sens.3 Thought is such a meaning. existence of the world is grave, but this gravity has the lightness of that which it is lightness itself (one can think whatever one wishes). This is grave, the what is to be thought, that is, of what just is), and yet this has no heaviness, This is intolerable, unbearable (one bends, collapses under the weight of weight of weightiness: its impalpable lightness. This is what cannot be forgotten. consideration. Which also means: joyous enough. This equation is the very of thought means that the world is grave enough by itself, without any other the height, here, proves null: nothing exceeds the measure of the world. The weight The height is equal to the fall, as is obvious that each time there is a fall. But fall." There is nothing any more, no more height from which one might fall. longer has any meaning. "The weight of thought" means the end of any "original center. It endlessly falls into it, hence it also does not fall into it. "To fall" no itself without falling anywhere. "Self" is a place of gravity without bottom or An infinite return into itself: it therefore does not return but falls back upon

Part One

THE FORGETTING OF PHILOSOPHY

Prefatory Note

We are told from various sides that our era has forgotten true philosophy, its authentic tasks and the soundness of its reflection. In fact, this call to order most often testifies to a forgetting of what philosophy is, of what it has become and of what one should do with it or in its name. It seemed desirable, even urgent, to show what has indeed been forgotten, to show at least the basic elements of what constitutes the current states and tasks of philosophy.

No discoveries are offered here in these pages. In one sense, this is simply a taking stock of the situation, often stating nothing more than what is doubtless already known. However, it would be useful, at least for once, if it were not presupposed to be known, since such a presupposition often proves quite fallacious (listening to what is said and reading what is written). What follows will be somewhat didactic, for not only have I tried to write for those who are well versed neither in the history nor in the techniques of philosophy, but I also thought it a good idea to clarify for myself some things that are easily "taken for granted" or are left to the penumbra of one's personal inclinations.

Consequently, I will appeal to many works, to many thoughts operative in our recent history and at the present time, but I will not name them. On the one hand, of course, I wanted to distance myself from polemical interests and rigidities engendered by proper names (without being so naive, however, as to believe they would be completely eliminated). On the other hand, I will try to restrict myself to what, at least to a certain extent, belongs to everyone and yet can be claimed by no one. With regard to the first point, this is no irenic declaration; thinking today is clearly embroiled in a state of struggle, and those who have taken up arms in order to foment the forgetting of philosophy are well aware of this. But this is not a quarrel between individuals or groups (no more than it is a mere conflict between ancients and moderns). For in this battle it is truth that is at stake. With regard to the second point, I do not wish to claim that thoughts that have their own particular styles, and whose differences (if not differends), deserve reflection, could be gathered into an anonymous synthesis. But I hold that in this division of thoughts, and thanks to it, there is something common to all of them, something that bears the mark of history, something that is ours in the sense that I will try to give to that word. (In the process, I grant something to those—diverse also, and yet similar—who make an amalgamated "modernity" the target of their attacks. I do not grant them the amalgam, only the existence of turning points and limits in history to which they are the belated and reactive witnesses.) In another sense, it will become clear that I am advancing only a single proposition, one for which I alone am responsible. This is inevitable. Thus, two distinct levels can be read here.

/ THE FORGETTING OF PHILOSOPHY

2 Introduction

That which might rightfully lay claim to the name of meaning dwells in what is open and not in what is closed upon itself.

-Adorno, Negative Dialectic

meaning no longer as message but as functionality, which itself then became impeccable mastery of its own sublation [releve]. It attempted to put forth it, it situated meaning (having then become a combinatory network) in the anything to say, but that what was interesting was the way in which they said dialectic of meaning: when structuralism declared that people no longer had tive but positivist. The idea of an "overcoming" stems from [relève de] a simple idea of "overcoming" the question of meaning, an idea that is not only posinothing to do with any of the determinations of meaning that our distant or existence, etc.) There is a positive sense to the question of meaning being recent past might offer us. Furthermore, it must have nothing to do with the termine. In order that it not be empty or illusory, this positivity must have more bluntly, we no longer have the sense of history, of destiny, of mystery, of sion: we no longer have a sense of history, of community or of truth-or, posed anew, but the mode or the nature of this "positivity" is difficult to deinterrupted. (This could also be stated, with all the ambiguity of the expresthe meaning of history, of the polis, of war, or of communication, has been this sense is not only negative—as when one claims, with good reason, that ily at least one sense [sens] to the question of meaning [sens] being posed. And should not be too quick to say that this agitation is in vain. There is necessaragain troubles the aging West, which believed itself to have overcome it. One More or less quietly, more or less clamorously, the question of meaning once

Yet our recent history surely cannot be assimilated to the fate of structuralism and its avatars alone, contrary to what certain people believe, and to what others feign to believe. It is not certain that, once reduced to functions of language, we would no longer have anything to say. Nonetheless, it is not certain that we can say this as if language were once again simply at our disposal. Something has been suspended in the reciprocal availability of meaning and of the speaking function. And if there is a question of meaning for us, it is dependent upon this suspension in such a precise and rigorous manner that the very meaning of the question as such is, from the outset, left in suspense. What is one asking, henceforth, when one asks for meaning? What is it to ask for meaning? What is the meaning of this request?

I would be at great pains indeed to determine the meaning of the return of the question of meaning. It is no one's exclusive province to effect this determination: it is, or will be, the effect of history, which has never ceased to give rise to the unprecedented, precisely because history itself is not someone and is not a subject (a subject is, perhaps, bound only to reproduce itself). And yet, I know—with a knowledge that is accessible to anyone who does not claim to rule over thought, or to make himself its overseer, but who intends rather to let it think, or to let it come to be—I know that this meaning could not take any other form (if it is a "form") than that of an opening (to use Adorno's term).

meaning [l'accueille] (but does not produce it), then the meaning that "dwells up. If meaning depends on thought, insofar as it is thought that welcomes to spell out what such an "opening" consists of, or at least how it first opens sible signification. One should at least attempt to think in this direction. happens-with all the force of its declaration, call, or demand. (At the risk of through which what belongs to meaning is able to happen, precisely because it intellectual attitudes (for such accommodating postures point instead to the an openness [ouverture] of thought, as one might say of liberal or conciliatory in what is open" depends on thought itself as opening [ouverture]. This is not located meaning, while meaning resides perhaps only in the coming of a pos-"meaning" is far from being identical to "signification." For signification is (supposed) mastery. Consequently, it is also the dimension according to which ther things, nor ideas, nor words-that would simply be at the disposal of its therefore also that dimension according to which thought has nothing-neitled; it is the one according to which everything essential comes to be. It is the one according to which nothing (nothing essential) is established or setform of the philosophical for the West.) The dimension of the open, then, is happens; but the wonder before the fact that it happens bears the name and repeating myself, I will say that philosophy is not, perhaps is never, that which forgetting of thought).2 It is, rather, thought as the opening to which and What does this mean? These pages have no other purpose than to attempt

But we must first clear the horizon of the problem. That is, we must discern the reasons why the current return of the question of meaning most often takes place under the heading of the "closure upon itself." At least this is how things are presented in the conventional wisdom, and by those who, in the name of such a "return," have demanded it the most vehemently in these last years. Such a discernment is indispensable if we are to move toward what happens to us and toward that which will call upon us in the order of meaning. It is probably even through the process of discerning the themes and structures of the "closed upon itself" that one may begin to make oneself available to the "open," to what comes—to that which, since it comes and since its essence lies in coming, in the yet-to-come, has no "self" upon which to close itself.

The Schema of the Return

cient, provided that thought is not too lazy. often found in solidarity with the representation in terms of "crisis") is suffiit is not certain that an interpretation in terms of "return" (which is most (perhaps only the return of a certain representation of "crisis"). More precisely, succession of these critical episodes signifies the "return" of anything at all eth century) a crisis of the modern world. But it is not at all certain that the crisis of the Christian world, and now (this is the whole history of the twentiworld, a crisis of the classical Greek world, a crisis of the Roman world, a meaning. We have thus seen—at the very least—a crisis of the ancient Greek at the meaning lost—one tries to retrieve it, or else tries to invent a new and, in the general vacillation of certainties and reference points, one is alarmed meaning comes undone, a philosophical, political, or spiritual order decays, punctuated by the periodic repetition of crises during which a configuration of questions do not return any more than do the faces of individuals. History is stereotypical phrase: "the return of the question of meaning." But in history, out of mere convenience and in order initially to make use of a somewhat Undoubtedly, the twenty-eight or so centuries of our Western history seem Leibnizian in that it obeys the principle of the impossibility of indiscernables. the return is in principle closed upon itself. If I have spoken of "return," it is Indeed, all that is presented in the form of the return or under the heading of

The point of view of the "return" conceives of each crisis in an identical manner and as the reproduction of the same episode. However varied the discourses that stem from this point of view may be, their fundamental typology can be reduced to a single model: in times of crisis, meaning is lost sight of, but when the crisis ends, when the dust has settled and the vagrancies and extravagances of the crisis have run their course, the demand for meaning reemerges: intact and unmistakable. The return thus first means that nothing had truly been lost and that neither the length of the crisis nor the abundance and intensity of its manifestations could have fundamentally altered a certain a certain common sense, an obvious rationality, verifiable by all in the accuas one might expect, according to which what returns, or what must return, is process of the immaculate Return begin with Descartes, or the Counter-Reforcoming, destruction, deconstruction, etc.) that philosophy has undertaken (that once again have to police the polis, its community, its customs and its thoughts. Solon of thought.4 From its very beginnings (and I will return to this), our racy of its measure and in the limit of its pretensions: it is ageless, it is the mation, or even the Church Fathers. There is also a less historicizing version, more extensive operations: they would have both the crisis and the slow, silent is to say, we are told, where it had gone astray) since Kant. Others propose yet thought of self (reflection, calling into question, radicalization, genealogy, overor economy, by those of anxiety, the letter, the body, and, especially, by this to have gone practically unaffected by the thoughts of the dialectic, of history order to proclaim the return of a certain Reason-at once critical, ethical, to bracket nothing less than the two centuries that separate us from Kant, in Western world alternately awaits or announces the return of Solon, who would juridical, regulative and humanistic-whose purity and necessity are purported This is how, for some time now, and from various places, one has hastened of the return and, on the basis of this, beyond these times, one must think the times, or despite the times, since it is still the time of the crisis. Against regains all the force of its overwhelming simplicity. One must think against to admit that one must think these times through. It is here that the schema why, if it is admitted that one must live with one's times, one in fact refuses though nothing has happened that would have to be taken into account. So, the times, and in order to put an end to them, one must think the scansion this, they may be all the more insidiously and profoundly reactive. This is political philosophy—hardline reactions are not in vogue nowadays. Yet for all tics—though, obviously, all this is but a matter of philosophical politics and of metaphysics any more than with the Enlightenment. In philosophy as in politicular aspect of the crisis. One could not, clearly, simply remain with classical now and then, one admits that there was some partial necessity to some parall the violence of untimely meditations), it is hardly possible today to act as elementary rule of modern consciousness (one no longer openly allows oneself tion of a whole segment of history. If only cautiously to comply with a kind of it is hardly possible nowadays to propose without further ado the neutralizareform and renewal This schema is, of course, rarely presented today with such simplicity, since

Idea (a schema, a paradigm, sometimes a norm) of Meaning. "Now all disciplines are restituted"—this line of Rabelais emblematizes all the thoughts of return: rebirth, restitution, restoration, rediscovery....

This refusal or avoidance before a thinking of the present day already and by itself testifies to the forgetting of philosophy. Indeed, of all the inaugural propositions of the philosophy of the contemporary era, none is more forgotten or misunderstood than Hegel's famous line: "The owl of Minerva spreads its wings only with the falling of dusk." What this line means is unambiguously established by its context:

Whatever happens, every individual is a child of his time; so philosophy too is its own time apprehended in thoughts. It is just as absurd to fancy that a philosophy can transcend its contemporary world as it is to fancy that an individual can overleap his own age.... If his theory really goes beyond the world as it is and builds an ideal one as it ought to be, that world exists indeed, but only in his opinions, an unsubstantial element where anything you please may, in fancy, be built.⁵

contrary) its possible repetition Merely to advocate a return to the law that was violated is not to think through the crime—it is to avoid thinking it through without avoiding (quite to the the reality that permitted them, gave rise to them, or was marked by them. not to accede to madness, stupidity, or the will to evil, but it is to accede to excesses, errors, and crimes also demand to be understood by thought; this is would conform to the norm of the return of what preceded this history. Deliriums, another way). But the philosopher does not refit in advance a history that is, he not only writes another history but thinks the very idea of history in philosopher thinks history through; he orders it into a new apprehension (that indiscriminately.... By thinking through the provenance of the present, the all the givens of our past at once, so as to try to swallow the whole mass that brings us to the eve of another real day. Not that it is a matter of taking the movement of the day that the night brings to a close and presents-and thinking through the real movement that is carried out in the real present, or and choosing from history, one has already denied oneself the possibility of so as to be better able to leap ahead toward the restorative return. By picking crisis," one has already de-realized the real. One has "overleapt one's age" backward hand, that which is to be classified under the rubric of "the delirium of the and presentation of reality. When one selects from the provenance of this present that which is, on the one hand, to be taken into account and, on the other present reality (the only one there is . . .) by thinking the present, the presence of a "present day"—that is, of the real; philosophy is that which thinks the The "falling of dusk" would thus be a certain fulfillment, the event and advent

The Will to Meaning

The schema of the return, thus traced back to the simplicity of its calculated distraction, or of its denial, with regard to the reality of history (this is the schema's way of inverting the ruse of reason that so scandalizes it; the schema ruses with reason itself), carries with it two major implications. On the one hand, the crisis is deemed merely superficial, and, on the other hand, the return of some deep meaning must be understood as the return of the identical. The crisis is superficial because it only consists, at best, in extravagant for-passing disorder, due to contingent causes, that in no way alters what is essential a term that is itself understood in the most superficial manner possible, as a thought that are not completely inconsistent, incommunicable and ephemeral? sion, between a few collective or individual pathologies and phenomena of certainly not: why such spectacular causal links, or relations of mutual expresone ask oneself: why this weakness, why these hungers or tendencies-and These questions are not asked because the crisis is treated as a mere sickness accounted for an impressive succession of errors and weaknesses. Never does of the salons (parisianisme is an old accusation, dear to certain Parisians) that plays the role of sub-Marxism), and, finally, the idling talents or the vainglory one does not even use such a tool or say what kind of causality is being used). of sub-Marxism: but since, as a rule, no one is a Marxist, at least not anymore, morbid or hermetic tendencies (this time sub-Nietzscheanism or sub-Freudianism Then it was the seductions of irrationality, the hunger for glamour or power, tive thought (one might almost be tempted to draw on the resources of a kinc ny's unfortunate incapacity to forge a political unity that engendered speculaunfortunate slippage, quickly corrected by the vigilance of orthodox Kantianism. self—the Hegelian conception of history is but a monstrosity (de Marxo, silemus!), But the crisis is also superficial in the causes of its aberrations: it was Germaand the speculative tendencies in Kant's philosophy of history are only an inspiration. For example—to take the obviously exemplary case of history itmations, or because it can be reduced to deviations that arose from a sound The crisis is superficial because it only consists, at best, in extravagant for

The Will to Meaning 1 19

tution of humors, reflexes, and metabolisms the same kind of diagnosis that ture, and language. And it would no doubt be possible to apply to this constistruggle, of the partitions of the world, of the putting to the test of art, literaby way of the modern experience and consciousness of the social bond and of ences," logical positivism, Bergson, Bataille, structuralism, and so on-but also culatory system that runs, for example, from Marx and Nietzsche to Heidegger, eral. Undoubtedly, there is a great physiology of thought, with a complex cirdoubt at stake, and perhaps even the entire philosophical constitution in gento discern what a so widely and durably infected philosophical corpus is suffer-Marx, or Freud) were nothing more than a "crisis," it would still be necessary that all contemporary thought stemming from Heidegger and Nietzsche (or ing from, and consequently, how this body was constituted. Even supposing "crisis," it would still be appropriate to diagnose what this philosophical body of romantic and speculative idealism after Kant were nothing more than a ness by way of its "critical" manifestations. Thus, even supposing that the whole moment of judgment (krisis), of the discernment of the true nature of the sickis no longer what its name meant to Greek physicians and to philosophy: the infections that require massive and immediate excisions. For them, the "crisis" expeditious of doctors: they diagnose only either minor colds or gangrenous Nietzsche himself initiated within philosophy on philosophy itself. . . . Benjamin and Wittgenstein by way of Kierkegaard, Husserl, the "human sciing from and how it functions. For a whole philosophical constitution is no (in which runs the blood of Kant, Leibniz, Spinoza, Rousseau, etc.) was sufferthe soul or the understanding, the philosophers of the return are the most If philosophy always puts itself in a more or less medical posture, treating and rigor cannot be demanded at a low cost, one must admit that one of the completion (which Heidegger also called an "end") of philosophy as such, and various modes by which contemporary thought has had to investigate a certain it would no longer be a question of crisis or diagnosis. These would be the operations on philosophy, other modes of questioning and judging it, in which without philosophical naiveté. But then one would have to undertake other sophical constitution and cannot be used, despite Nietzsche or thanks to him, or hygienic models it entails, themselves belong to the most traditional philoprices to be paid (in fact, the lowest price) is the relinquishing of the themes philosophy that is forgetful of itself and its history—one that is thus twice want to undertake such an investigation, one has already confined oneself to a the new relation to itself or out of itself that is thus opened. If one does not "finished." If, on the contrary, one recognizes that philosophical seriousness Unless we should find that the medical paradigm, along with the orthopedic > signification shielded from history by a strange intellectual freeze. signification collapses. The other return merely designates the preservation of a rather, to an eternity understood as an infinite opening of meaning where its Nietzsche conceives the now in its exposure to an eternity of meaning, or, noted that this has nothing to do with Nietzsche's "eternal return of the same." meaning that is identical to itself beneath the swell of change. But it should be ble character of meaning in its insistent return. This return is the return of a To the superficial character of the crisis corresponds the deep and immutaseveral consequences of this. finally re-valorized: clarity, responsibility, communicability, and so on. There are the same philosophical virtues necessary to enact these values in a humanity man, the subject, communication, rationality, and so on-and by a call back to is regularly followed by a call back to the same values—that is, to value itself: wonder . . .), the slightest irruption, the slightest stirring or innovation of thought, For nearly two centuries now (and this length of time alone should make us preserve access to the commonplace, one must be wary of too closely examining in the limited context of a few general statements of intent. But in order to in each thought only a few terms (for example, "freedom") that are to be taken tuted.... One can come to this agreement only on the condition of retaining names Mallarmé, Rimbaud, Picasso, and Joyce might be combined or substicord of thoughts, certain notable exceptions: at the very least, and despite evonly be agreed upon on the condition that one neglect, in this supposed conerything, since unfortunately it seems that it must be said despite everything, monplace remains, a silent and ghostly presence.) Yet this commonplace can Marx, Nietzsche, Freud, Heidegger, Wittgenstein, and a sixth, for which the meaning is simply no longer raised, or, rather, since it is foreclosed, the combe called general symbolic analysis. But since, in these cases, the question of from humanism, appear to keep themselves at a distance from this commonenterprises, more playful or seemingly more anxious to distinguish themselves the name of the thoughts of the contemporary world, can coexist. (Certain of facile declarations and not philosophical work? This agreement is the veritanity, and the right of men to share these same values—as long as it is a matter upon the values of freedom, rationality, communication, responsibility, digobvious fact or a foregone conclusion. Who today would not be quick to agree place; these may range from a new hedonism to various forms of what could ble commonplace in which, if not all thoughts, at least all declarations made in taken as ideals or demands ever since modern thought became for itself an nothing other than the complete collection of those received ideas that were themes that constitute the overall meaning that is alleged to return consists in The first consequence—or rather corollary—is that the set of notions or the exact construction of the concepts and the stakes of the systematics or problematics in which these concepts are produced. The philosophical commonplace that is offered to us as the return of the philosophy, this commonplace that we must agree, and once again despite everything, to call by the name humanism (in a sense that would hardly be recognizable to historic humanism, which produced a rupture in thought and for which "man" was a thought of rupture, not consensus), can hardly be characterized (despite everything...) as anything but an ideology, that is, a thought that does not critique or think through its own provenance and its own relation to reality.

already know; the man whose rights are respected is given over to a freedom survive. For the other third, it is the modern name of a Narcissus who is at a agreement refuses to realize that it is arrived at before a humanity that has that necessarily exceed the significations of humanism. not been entirely brought to light, thereby releasing possibilities of meaning or true to be done with these Ideas as long as the system of their closure has nity," as we are with the steam train. It means that there is nothing essential This does not mean that we are through with "man," "freedom," or "commuslavery, and which brings another essence—or another meaning—into play. other to think sovereignty, which is not simply the cessation or the opposite of manism. It is one thing to denounce the ignominy of slavery; it is quite anfact that freedom, community, and so on, are foreclosed in philosophical huneither meaning nor flesh. And the reason for this perhaps lies precisely in the and to a community that, he is told, is his meaning but that has for him the name of political or moral demands. That is no reason to ignore what we rights of man does not fail to fulfill necessary functions from time to time in loss before the disappearance of his own image. Certainly, the discourse on the two-thirds of this humanity, "man" is, in sum, a denial; he is barely allowed to humanity that feels that it inhabits the least human of all possible worlds. For long despaired or been disgusted by the appeals made to its own "meaning," a ment concerning the ideology of a "meaning of man." But this somnambulistic Undoubtedly, it will still be easy for quite some time to come to an agree-

The second consequence is that the return that is announced or called for, to the extent that it is the return of the identical, ultimately consists less in a return of than in a return to. One might still suppose that the return of meaning would be similar to that of Ulysses, who does not come back just as he left—who comes back, for example, under the name of Bloom, and who undoes his own legend by repeating it ("undoing one's own legend" means saying that there is something more to be said). But this would require a specific reflection on return, on repetition. It would require a precise elaboration of the nostos and of the difference or drift that entails it. Joyce's gesture is one version of such an elaboration. It was clearly not by chance that it occurred in an era in which (since romanticism and since Nietzsche) a more or less direct investigation into the essence of the return had become a philosophical preoccupation. But this preoccupation, and consequently any elaboration of the problematic of return (and perhaps of the West and philosophy themselves as return), are foreign to those who, in the end, are demanding a return to: to values, to reason, to God, to Kant, or to God knows what else.

the wrong way to go. or else, simply the dates of errors or lies, instructive if taken as indications of wandering. Ultimately, the intermediary dates are but false dates in historydistinguishes them is nothing—nothing but the negligible time of crisis and missed in 1785. The two dates are therefore essentially identical, and what active one; one can annul the interim and, in 1985, get the good start that was positive. There is no retreat; it is not a retrograde move. It is, rather, a retroand that one decide to return to the point of departure. This move is entirely the fact that thought has been wandering since about 1795 (or 1580, or 402), back on the right track. All that is required is that one be suddenly alerted to mentary. Historically speaking, it amounts to nothing; it simply puts history or wandered from the path, and then sets off in the right direction. Nothing ward" could not easily be analyzed by philosophy nowadays in terms of a resohas happened; the return is a neutral or null move, and is, in fact, only mohaving gone astray. One goes back to the place where one took a wrong turn logic of the forward march, on the condition that one accept the possibility of lute march or a guided path. But it is the return to, in fact, that obeys the (despite everything) are no longer of our age; undoubtedly, "taking a step fordiscovery or progress. Christopher Columbus, Descartes, Condorcet, and Kant forward march, which would fall in with the too obviously dated models of time). I will not oppose to this, however, the image of a pure and simple retreating in order to advance (unless it is in order to leap better . . . over its The return to seems to assume a strange way of proceeding. It proposes

But under these conditions, where in history can a true date and a true starting point be found? Let us assume that it lay in Kant (since he is the one we hear about most, as if, moreover, we had been waiting for the call to return in order to read and reread Kant). Following this assumption, Kant would be the moment of a rupture and an inauguration. But what law of history would limit the inauguration to Kant? What conception of history would authorize such a law? For lack of a response to these questions, which, moreover, are not even raised, one proceeds as if Kant at once inaugurated and was himself nothing more than the return of and to an Idea whose provenance is here left undetermined. The logic of the return is caught in a history that it at once

while shaking off the yoke of historical thought, undertaken to teach us that settled in the alluvium of history, nor, consequently, has it been inscribed in again present present of the good start, it has not properly passed; it has not under way. As for the past of the crisis itself, which was posterior to the once past stopped passing—in order to let the crisis pass before getting the return in the end, we have arrived. But we are never told exactly how or when the relation to which something has happened [arrive], a past in relation to which, would be freedom and man's vocation. This is to acknowledge that the return or happiness . . .): the gap is too great, and one would find that something was time to time, someone makes a move in this direction, regarding law, morality, fact that no one advocates a return to pre-Christian Antiquity (although, from the death of God, the proletariat, or Auschwitz, respectively or all at once. there is some past that quite simply did not take place [ne s'est pas passe]: Hegel, its fecundity. It is overcome [dépassé], that is all. For some time now, one has, has limits, and that "somewhere" there is a past that has passed, a past in lacking; for some, it would be God, for others, the subject, for everyone, it denies and affirms, at once corrects and submits to. This is confirmed by the general. (More precisely, one would have to say that the determined meaning a determined meaning as meaning itself, or else the category of meaning in of humanist ideology is presented as immediately subsumed under the category Third consequence: that to which it is a matter of returning is not so much of meaning in general, whose task and stakes it assumes.)

ence of an intelligible determination in the sensible mode (a particular reality Meaning in general is meaning understood as signification. Signification itself, that is, meaning in the sense of "signification" (which is the most ordinary succint formulation might be: the meaning of things is presented in the meanand/or the materiality of the sign itself). From Plato to Saussure, signification sensible) reality in the ideal (or intelligible) mode (which is what one calls actly, or not simply, "meaning"; it is the presentation of meaning. Significasense of the word "meaning" in our language and in philosophy) is not exscience, and calculation of the reasons of the real). ing of words and vice versa, or else, even more laconically: logology (discourse ble, then signification would be the dialectical resolution of this division. Its is, properly speaking, the conjunction of a sensible and an intelligible, con-"meaning"); or else, and reciprocally, it consists in the assignment of the prestion consists in the establishment or assignment of the presence of a factual (or lesson of philosophy; if we assume the division between sensible and intelligi-"signification" is taught (signified) by the most elementary and most constant joined in such a way that each presents the other. The meaning of meaning as

In Kantian terms—since these are the most appropriate here and since it is

sible reality, that of his works and/or signs. humanism of signification: the ideality of man presents itself right in his senreality of man presents itself right in the ideality called "man." And this is the better yet, as closure upon itself. This is the signification of humanism: the cation is thus the very model of a structure or system that is closed upon itself, or what the intuition sees and the intuition sees what the concept thinks. Signifitrue property: the concept thinks and the intuition sees; the concept thinks together. It relates each one to the other as to that which confers upon it its blind. In other words, signification realizes the one in the other and the two that through which concepts are no longer empty and intuitions no longer indeed our relation to Kant that is at stake—signification is properly speaking one through the other. ject, capable of presenting the concept and the intuition together, that is, the orders the real. The self [soi], the selfsame [soi-même]8 "upon" which this syslocus or agency of this homogeneity, its support and substance; it is the subtem closes itself (and which it in fact constitutes by this very closure) is the by rendering its two sides homogeneous. Reality has an order to it, and reason perfectly human form), signification is the assurance that closes the gaping void (this does not date back to Kant, but in his work it takes on its modern and bility that thought is empty and the correlative possibility that reality is chaos Before the terrifying or maddening abyss that is opened between the possi-ics to the analogical, symbolic, and even "negative" modes of morality, aesthetics schematism, this project nonetheless began in Kant's work itself. Signification sentation: sensible, moral, logical, aesthetic, political, metaphysical. Even though modern philosophy in the explicit will to, and systematic project of, total precalled "signifiance"). 10 All this suffices to make the whole of philosophy into a of its own advent (which cannot itself be a signification, but the act or movethere takes on different modes, ranging from the ostensive mode of mathemat-Kantian thought in its most acute tension never forgot the question of the the open and shut enigma of the schematism was necessary in order to engage general enterprise of signification and presentation. One could even say that namely, that signification in no way yields the "meaning" of its own production or ment in which the possibility of meaning arises-which has sometimes been to the question; it suffices to ignore that which nonetheless is thereby revealed, not simply a supplementary clarification but perhaps a whole other approach to its obscurity. It suffices not to wonder whether this obscurity might demand art" of what he baptized the "schematism." It suffices to leave this ungraspable tutes this presentation are declared by Kant to be forever ungraspable, the "hidden place as presentation. The force or "sleight of hand" (Handgriff)9 that consti-That is why, in Kant, signification or meaning designates that which takes

and history—but it is still essentially signification, it is still the demand and the logic of its closure (Kant speaks of the "satisfaction" of reason) that are at stake. From Kant to Husserl, the great philosophical lineage has done nothing but modulate the will to presentation in various ways.

(Undoubtedly, this great modulation has constantly come to touch on the limit 11 of signification and put it into question; it has constantly raised the question of the meaning of the provenance of meaning, the question of the opening of meaning, and of an other "meaning" of meaning. In fact, it has raised this question as such. It is thus philosophy itself that brought to light the question of its own closure, of its own edge on the outskirts of meaning. I will return to this later on, for it is through this obstinacy about the limit of signifying presentation that philosophy properly carries out the act of philosophical thought. The forgetting of philosophy is the forgetting of this obstinacy.)

The will to presentation constantly makes meaning return—that is, the meaningful essence of meaning [l'essence sensée du sens], or signification—in knowledge, history, work, the State, the community, law, ethics, and even in art and faith, because this will is the presupposition of meaning: there must be signification, that is, Ideas must not be empty, and experience must not be chaos. (The limit of this unconditioned demand is found in the Idea of the presentation of the unconditioned itself; this is the Kantian sublime. The sublime—indissociably aesthetic, moral, political and philosophical—makes another opening of "meaning" rise up against the background of signification out of which it emerges. This sublime, as such, is perhaps already no longer a sufficient resource for us. It still adheres, albeit negatively, to the logic of presentation and risks preserving a maximum of signification. It should be noted, however, that the partisans of the return do not refer to the Kant of the sublime nor to his heirs.)

The return is thus each time a return to this will to meaning. If one agrees, along with Kant and as it is no doubt necessary to do since Montaigne and Pascal, that man does not have or is not himself a signification that is already produced and available, then he has or is at the very least the signification of this will, and thus has or is the signification of the subject of signification or presentation. This is how contemporary humanism defines itself: as the self-presentation of the will to meaning, or more exactly, as the self-presentation of the meaning of the will to meaning. That which governs the process and project of signification is the following: "man" signifies this project—and this project signifies man.

Thus we can see how the thoughts of the return keep returning to this commonplace made up of "freedom," the "subject," "communication," and so on; these categories or regulative Ideas are in sum the transcendentals, in the scholastic sense of the term, of signification. They are its fundamental predicates; signification, or presentation, must be produced by the subject, which presents itself (therein lies its "freedom") and thus communicates, and communicates itself all by itself. Humanism is the complete system of the autodonation of meaning. As for "value," a theme that never fails to punctuate the demands for return, it is nothing other than signification as willed; "value" is meaning that is not yet realized but whose (postulated) meaning regulates the gait and direction of our every step. Humanism is the postulation of the meaning of man and confers perhaps no other meaning upon man than that of his infinite postulation. In a sense, humanism deliberately (willfully) goes no further than man's will. The inhumanity of his world is not terribly surprising.

The Displacement of Meaning

via the project of signification. Shakespeare, Pascal, La Rochefoucauld, Sterne, Diderot, Lichtenberg, Rousseau.... model of the ancients, hence, modern man-experienced himself: Montaigne, The thought of progress (sometimes in the works of these same authors) reacts let us say, the man of the second "humanism," who could no longer live on the protective reaction against the distress and wandering in which modern manthat moment and according to that movement. Rather, it was the result of a is the thought of a fruition of presupposed meaning—only constituted itself at progress—which is in sum the matrix of the thoughts of the return, being as it eighteenth century. This was not the result of progress, for the thought of ardent demand, did not become general and permanent until the end of the without the signification of a project. The feeling of this necessity, with its of the return; we cannot stand ourselves without a project of signification, or whole problem) has been defined, structured, or magnetized by this will as much as it has. This is proven by the constancy and the reactive demands of the thoughts philosophy (in the West), no age before ours (if it is still ours and that is the in one sense to this thought. But one must first determine the extent to which, in I will try to explain how all of philosophy, from its inception, has corresponded

The thoughts of the return repeat this reaction. This does not justify them. On the contrary, it condemns them. It condemns them without appeal (and without there being any need to introduce the slightest bias into this condemnation; this is all so clear, so overwhelming—hardly a question of preference...). It condemns them because the time that has passed, the event, the work of history and the uncompromising suspicion of philosophy itself have all brought this to light: the will to signification is but a "human, all too human" reaction to the unprecedented experiment that the West undertook (or at least, that it thought it was undertaking at that time, but in which it may have been involved one must not try to give a signification to this moment (when "the eastern order of signification from out of a different order. This different order perhaps covered or restored signification. It is rather the experience of an entry into the since it invents signification, and since in its modern form it gives rise to the a "loss of meaning," as a thought of crisis or return would say, since such a never was; for the historian, in any case, the five hundred years that preceded will to signification, does not in fact proceed from lost signification to rediswould come to muddle or conceal. But the experiment or experience of the West, tive illusion (so tenacious and so deep-seated in the West) according to which, from the start, and by which it defines itself). This was not the experience of we would not be able to give it meaning within the logic of signification. us, or in us, we would not be able to name it or describe it in our discourse; order exterior to signification, and even if it is still present somewhere among there was or is a model for the logic of mimesis). Even if there was once an possible to signify what the West's first models were, or, more radically, whether signification cannot be posed under the conditions or in the terms of significameaning of any of our days or nights. The question of an order exterior to signification. There was another day, then, upon which we cannot confer the Mediterranean was at history's degree zero, or nearly so"), not even a "nocturnal" the birth of the West are, in Braudel's words, "the night," which means that "before," there was some established, shared signification available that the crisis formulation is founded upon the reconstitution after the fact or the retrospecthoughts of mimesis set themselves the task of thinking the fact that it is imin myth,"13 if this expression means anything; or else, on another level, all our tion (thus all our conceptions of "myth" have never made us accede to a "life nitying either its own advent or the establishment of the order of signification. something that it could not signify, and consequently, the impossibility of sig-By experiencing an "entry" into signification, the West experienced an exit from than that of opening and undoing that which encloses itself in signification. speak of an "order" is already to say too much.) It has perhaps no other meaning would be the will to signification's supreme and most tenacious illusion. (To But, once again, it is not here a matter of trying to signify this order; this would itself be a thought, and the conceptual void would itself be a reality. . . . and to this subject. One could also say that, in this different order, chaos and that "reality" would not be this thing that is signified and presented by "thought" would not be the representational-significative activity of a subject, "thought" and "reality" would have no currency. This amounts to saying that reality could not be chaos, because the division thus presupposed between One can only try to say that in this order thoughts could not be empty and such a way that we would have to retrieve or reconstitute it. We are always Thus, we have never forgotten, lost, muddled, or masked signification in > one that is, by definition, to be recovered, restored, or revived. or transcendent presence of a meaning that has been lost, forgotten, or altered tion. Thus the enterprise of meaning always begins by signifying the anterior degree to which it signifies itself from the outset as a deprivation of significa-"subject" and its disarray emerge all at once; at that moment, a disorientation condition, from a cruel or happy absence of laws, and so on. At that moment, stammering, of lies or delirium, from chaos or fate, from an animal or divine (which is the Occident itself) occurs that demands signification to the very the subject represents itself as alone; or rather, at that moment, "solitude," the We were emerging from a loss or blurring of signification, from a moment of time, we have given this access the signification of a process [procest] or a progress. cient age entered signification as the ordering [disposition] of the world. Each been the access to signification as will to produce signification, while the analready in it; we have always only just entered it—and the modern age has

and as the re-orientation promised to the Occident. return conceive of meaning as something whose essence has a structure of return crisis precedes and provokes the demand for its return. The thoughts of the cated in the representation of the loss or obliteration of the meaning whose senting it by signifying it. The signifier presents as signified the meaning that was silently signifying itself beforehand. This movement of the return of meaning. whatever mode, and signification consists in recapturing this presence and prewhich constitutes meaning itself in signification, reveals itself by being reduplition of signification; meaning, or the signified, is present, by definition and in Egypt). Now, this obligatory antecedence governs the very structure or operaas Plato represented himself as already present in Hesiod or in the priests of Christianity represented itself as already potentially present in Antiquity, just sometimes even a "premonition"; one need only think of the way in which already available (whether it be in the guise of a "regulative idea," a "value," or cessity) that signification is always already given or present, that it was always confronts us with what might be called the fantasy of signification. These reprent, indeed consubstantial with the establishment of the order of signification, or the (always curable) crisis of meaning are representations that are concuris by means of the fantasy itself. Now the fact that the (always provisional) loss matters is to know whether the way to free oneself of the effects of the fantasy resentations indeed signify (such is their function and the reason for their neman and thus does not spare our being concerned about this distress. What any fantasy. It does not prevent the distress and wandering of the disoriented in no way prevents the reality of its effects, which are as powerful as those of The fact that the prior and provisional loss of meaning is a represented loss the return of meaning. And yet, at the same time, the crisis of the loss must Such a structure thus implies that the loss of meaning is also essential for and/or things, remote in some heaven of Ideas, or projected by the aim of a and, at the same time, it must be absent, nearly inaccessible, far behind words example of signification; it prescribes meaning itself, which is thus present, but strictly according to the philosophical economy of meaning, is indeed a prime criticized in Kant's moral law (and this moral law, at least when considered constant displacement—which is also its dissimulation (Verstellung)—which Hegel endlessly brings back the ambiguity; hardly have we entered into meaning will. This ambiguity is indispensable to its structure of return. But the return and return is thus revealed; meaning must be present, available, visible, immovable to return to meaning. A fundamental ambiguity of all thoughts of signification appear only as a superficial accident, otherwise one might no longer know how analysis, in their virtual vanishing for the benefit of the presentation of meaning. of appearances lies precisely in the reality they veil, the meaning of becoming essentially consists in this infinite displacement or flight. For example, the meaning distant). The meaning of signification, or meaning in terms of signification. since the meaning of that meaning can only be prescribed, it remains infinitely into history, or into the depths of the signified. Meaning is affected by this hardly have we come near it, when it has to move away again, into the heavens, the meaning of appearances, becoming, or language always consists, in the final in the meaning that it keeps at a signified's distance... Or else, and symmetrically, lies precisely in the permanence it masks, the meaning of language lies precisely claims for itself the health or normality that keeps slipping absence under its satisfaction, to the elsewhere over the here. But in reality, it is a thought that to discredit them. This complicity lies in the thought of signification as the remained, at a certain level, in complicity with that thought that today seeks role, in calling our attention to and in precipitating the crisis. But they have maintained its vocabulary and concepts. They have nevertheless played their in part, caught in the logic of signification to the very extent that they have "signified" onto an infinitely vanishing line [ligne de fuite] have remained, at least that have valorized an order of the "signifier" and have projected the order of the not mean, however, that one should side with absence. Certain theoretical attitudes the indefinite or infinite perspective of its projection into an elsewhere. This does move [en déplacement]; or more exactly, the presence of meaning immediately opens meaning that thought invokes is always elsewhere, always displaced, always on the presences, that keeps hollowing out a void at the heart of its plenitudes. The accorded to absence over presence, to the empty over the full, to lack over understand as a crisis, a pathology, even as a perversion of thought: a privilege considered to be constitutive features of contemporary thought, which they In the last few years, some have taken pleasure in identifying what they

The Project of the Subject

In jest, one might say that in the desire for meaning the problem is not meaning but, rather, desire. In other words, if the desire for meaning characterizes that which is completely enclosed in the thought of signification, that which keeps it in the metaphysical Verstellung, it is not because this thought concerns itself with meaning (this is said without the expectation of being able to say more about "meaning" to those who believe or feign to believe that current thought is only concerned with nonmeaning, nonsense, or trivialities foreign to meaning) but because it posits meaning as an object of desire (and in the end it is on the basis of that position that the determination of meaning as signification is engendered).

ence-at-a-distance. In Hegelian terms, the unhappiness of consciousness presents own desire (or else: itself as desire) as the sign or symptom of its own presject enters into the order of signification by beginning to decipher itself and its of meaning, or, more precisely, the sign of its presence-at-a-distance. The subat once the appetite for the signifying fulfillment and the sign of the distance subject defines itself as the subject of its desire, and this desire is the desire to of loss and desire reveals, from the outset and by itself, a decisive feature of become a subject (such is the law of the Verstellung). In other words, desire is the distance, and that which first has meaning is the tension toward it. The meaning of this meaning: it is at a distance, its very presence presents itself in this meaning: its absence or distance. So much so that desire offers the first rection, a history, a proximity, a memory). But at the same time, this system find what was never present (respectively or simultaneously an identity, a dicast respectively or simultaneously as want, will, need, nostalgia, . . .) or to out of which is born the desire either to recover what has been lost (a desire rather qualifies desire as such. From Montaigne or Descartes to Rousseau and Proust, everything begins with a situation of loss or of being lost in which or itself; and this "desire for meaning" is surely not a particular kind of desire but The desire for meaning marks in every way the modern subject's access to signifier of the distant signified, or of the distance of meaning. This is how with Hegel the ontological qualification of the access to the Self-is the empty absence of an intellectual intuition in human reason?) Desire—which becomes desire orders the reign of signification. logic that, already in Kant, governed the critique of reason on the basis of the the meaning of consciousness, and presents it as conscious. (But was is not this sign's finality, a thought that is exacerbated in the modern age. The goal of toward reality. The West in its entirety is preoccupied with the thought of the of an approximation; that is, it can only maintain a distance, and keep meaning eighteenth to twentieth centuries there has perdured the will to construct a nature inadequate to its own end; either languages are poorly made (from the the signifier is to present the signified. But the sign, or the signifier in it, is by the sign, its direction [sens], is to lead to or to present meaning, and the goal of desire; it is the tension of the signifier toward the signified, or else of the sign completion, that is, comes to die. prising that in these signifiers the meaning of the signifier "god" comes to signifiers of its distance, and which might be, depending on the case, Science, at a distance. The teleology of signifying presentation is thus bound to the instrument of signifying adequation or imitation is by definition only capable History, the State, Freedom, Value, Man, or Meaning itself. It is hardly surineffable. The ineffable itself has its signifiers, which are consequently only the "well-made language"), or else language is fraught with metaphoricity. The On the one hand, desire is the law of signification. Signification itself is

on. And still this subject is present-at-a-distance, whether because it is posited in the end, constitutes the meaning of art, of the polis, of philosophy, and so all obeying the same logic: that of significatively referring back to the subject is certainly not "insignificant"...), and yet this does not prevent them from may even contradict one another, they may fail to signify one another (which worldview are all, or are all presented as, so many aspects of the same general stitution, artistic invention, psychoanalytic verbalization, logico-mathematical that by definition "we'll never see the end of," or perhaps even because, in the is given as the end of a (historical, poetic, or pedagogical) process—a process in the Idea or in Value (Man, Freedom, Science, or Philosophy) or because it that is in the process of signifying itself, that is, to the desiring subject, which function of signification. These various aspects may come into conflict and hermeneutic approach, semiological analysis, and, finally, the philosophical the literary enterprise, experimental procedures, historical action, political conformalization, technological self-management, humanistic valorization, the itself organized into a system, or at least into a series of signifying practices: On the other hand—but on the whole, this is the same operation—desire is > sophical, or humanitarian, etc.). subject is identified with the movement of the process itself (whether it be literary, logico-mathematical, theoretical, technological, psychoanalytical, philofinal analysis, and as if to make sure that we will not see the end of it, this rubrics of lack and project. nitely homologous or substitutable. They can be classified under the two general tation of meaning, the marks of desire and the features of signification are infi-Throughout this gigantic operation, this unique and polymorphic implemen-

would only come to light in another era, briefly designated by the names Benjamin, not inexact, remains summary.) Heidegger, or Wittgenstein. Hence I allow myself a periodization, which, though begun to suspend this desire, or call it into question, before Husserl, though it the other hand, and as I will be led to investigate later, something had already But its various figures undoubtedly can no longer produce anything new. On for clarification, for the desire for meaning does not simply end with Husserl. history, Bergsonian élan, Husserlian intention, et cetera. (This et cetera calls activism, Hegelian unhappiness, Nietzschean fever, Kierkegaardian angst, Marxian Cartesian impatience and will, Humian frustration, Kantian dissatisfaction, Fichtian Meaning is lacking, and this lack unleashes all the forms or figures of desire:

lished the exemplum or matrix of that by which this mortal task is which one must learn to will as such. Even though Montaigne had also estabthe goal became the end—the end of meaning in the sense of its cessation meditation on life, not death. In a way, Spinoza sought nothing other than a in his rejection of Montaigne's formula. According to Spinoza, philosophy is a meaning and subject that are lacking—this fact would still not prevent, on the remunerated—the work (the written one, in particular) as a substitute for the metaphysics was already touching on the limit of signification). With Montaigne thought of meaning without distance. Hegel, too, in his own way. With them in many respects, represents in modern thought ultimately and essentially lies fication is the end [arrêt] of signification). (The fascinating exception that Spinoza, tween us and our signification (or even better, teaching us that the final signihow to die," that is, for him, teaching us to accept the infinite distance betask-and this is also why he assigns to philosophy the goal of "teaching us and for all, at the threshold of the era of desire, the exemplum of this endless is condemned in advance to an infinite exhaustion. Montaigne established once hole full of fever and disorder—the fever and disorder of an identification that where, one that consequently never ceases to reopen in the subject a gaping elation that its truth, value, and end lie elsewhere, though it is itself this elsepower of the negative: the division of the subject from itself, the ensuing rev-In each of these figures, desire is at work with its own power, which is the

both the work as signification and signification as work; we will return to this sea of its own desire. (It was a single movement, no doubt, that exhausted (from romanticism to Mallarmé and Joyce) from eventually drowning in the genuine presentation; nor would it prevent the infinite, interminable Work contrary, the widening of the gap between the substitute for presentation and well as all kinds of "aims" at ahistorical, if not antihistorical, values. same—the accomplishment of signification, the realization of "man"—and, on of desire itself. Desire orients, but it orients above all insofar as it is a desire conditions, the direction or orientation essentially consists in the pro-tension must go straight ahead without trying to choose a direction [sens]. Under these tion of meaning. Descartes says so explicitly; the traveler lost in the forest that provides the direction, as if by a kind of spontaneity that is an anticipadirection from being given, it is the very gesture of throwing oneself ahead of the absent meaning, or more exactly, since that absence prevents a priori a the other, infinitely varied: it gave rise to all kinds of "meanings of history," as for orientation. This is why its orientation is, on the one hand, always the The lack initiates the project; the subject throws itself ahead in the direction

"paradise," "the West Indies," or "the reign of justice and freedom." What oriented and orienting, proceeds from the void hollowed out by the flight of constantly being reworked. The goal can remain figurative-whether it be called or metaphorically, indirectly, or provisionally, by means of a sketch that is meaning. This is also why orientation does not always claim to signify and darkness. Orientation, along with the thought that considers itself to be both beautiful, of the good, the dawn of meaning. Even if this light must once and toward what it has, by essence, lost: daybreak, the light of the true, of the which can rule, direct, or even be the norm for the movement of the Occident of existence. For the man of humanism, his present and his presentation (his through the individual act of the project and the aim, but never in the present This becoming may be accomplished through the succession of generations, or through education, intention, effort, transformation, progression, anamnesis he is, but only in his project and as project. He has to become what he is, the truth of the subject. Curiously, the man of humanism can never be where that it signifies itself; it signifies the project, and the project as such signifies matters is not so much that the aim properly signifies the goal, but, rather, present the object of its aim. It can be content with designating it analogically its dim Orient is still worthy to lead our steps, rather than abandoning us to the version of a reasonable humanism, brave in the face of disenchantment), for all be declared chiaroscura, fraught with inevitable shadows (this would be In each case, what is at stake is the very meaning [valeur] of orientation: that > thus by nature inexhaustible. accumulation in the form of the will to signify). Project and projection are meaning's loss into a surplus-value of signification by means of a primitive of signification (this, moreover, is what defines dialectic: the conversion of and so on. Projection is thus the true order of signified meaning, that is, meaning tion: visions (or conceptions) of the World, of Man, of Community, of Right, ing—or its presence-at-a-distance—is dialectically converted into an abundance the subject has a project and projection for its truth that the lack of meanput at a distance by signification and by the desire for it. It is precisely because and meanings communicate, or perhaps commune, in the essence of projecnification. On this screen, ideals, fantasies, ideas, theories, thoughts, values, the screen of representation since their status or nature is of the order of sigvalues, even the idea and value of the subject itself, can only be projected onto priates the presence-at-a-distance of meaning in the mode of projection. Ideas, meaning) cannot coincide. On the contrary, in the project, the subject approas project, or that its signification, is not becoming more and more harshly and this, to the very extent that this projection is repeated—that its essence since that is its essence. It is, however, becoming less and less certain everydayconfronted by protests arising from the most glaring injustices (wherever poverty freedom is always content with being a project—and a return of the project did not change the nature of democratic thought. The project of rights and But their ultimate failure (if it is indeed a failure, and if it is indeed ultimate) their own projections, fantasies of immediacy opposed to indefinite mediation. in its own way, found in the use of this repetition a resource for precipitating inexhaustible repetition of its projection. Fascism, nazism, and Stalinism, each like people," as Rousseau used to say), or constantly indulged itself in the constantly run up against the infinitude of its own project ("Good for a godambitions. But in a hundred different ways, too, the desire for democracy has nities, to sharing out responsibilities, to reducing violence and to limiting one calls "totalitarianism" no doubt represents the height of orienting and sig-In a hundred different ways, this philosophy has contributed to restoring digin a hundred different ways, ranging from Rousseau to Che Guevera, from nifying thought), I will give but one example: since its inauguration, the phiwho claim to see totalitarian tendencies in the thoughts of crisis (whereas what Kant to Bakounin or to Pannekoek, from Tocqueville to Gandhi or to Arendt. losophy of democracy has always represented its Idea as project and projection risk of shocking, at the risk, even, of seeming to provide ammunition to those fies the true because the true is found within the scope of the project. At the the return itself, which refers back to the project and projection, already signi-This is an additional and final confirmation of the thought of the return; flies in the face of the most modest sense of the term "democracy") as well as by the most concerned or most disillusioned interrogations of the very meaning of the political. There is no doubt that all other current political forms stem from more fantastical and dangerous games of signification, and yet this does not allow one to be content with a "democracy" that is imperturbably signified. What is the meaning of the political when all political significations touch on their own insignificance? This is what one should try to think.

36 / THE FORGETTING OF PHILOSOPHY

Meaning Signified

what it has exhausted.) exhausted [à bout]. They are of various styles and calibers, but what they have once again wait for, desire, and project it. (In another sense, lamenting this in common is that they do not forget philosophy-neither its demands nor for the last fifty years to investigate what thinking means when signification is name, when precisely it has been the work of a certain number of philosophers absence amounted to insinuating that we did not have a thinker worthy of the at a distance, re-orient us and cast us toward it again even while making us fying projection of the will to signification) who would give us back meaning to lamenting the absence of a figure (for there must be a major figure, a signipresent-at-a-distance. Lamenting the absence of a great philosopher amounts sofar as it can be given by an operation of signification, meaning is as losopher" symbolized the lack of philosophy as that which gives meaning. Ininspire us with the spirit and energy of his project. The lack of a "great phivision of the world, to sketch out for us its signification and, consequently, to we were lacking a great philosopher, one who would be able to impart to us a presenting significations. A few years ago one could read in the newspaper than excellence. In this regard, philosophy is what gives meaning by elaborating and tains projection and announces the project; it is the "visionary" discourse par The thought of signification determines philosophy as the discourse that sus-

The representation of philosophy as "provider of meaning" is moreover not restricted to philosophies—or to those so-called philosophies—that seek to communicate a full and positive "meaning." It is also suitable for discourses that, in a pessimistic, skeptical, prudent, or lax mode, conclude that meaning is incomplete, weak, relative, or nonsensical. Indeed, even the impossibility of completing a signification, or of completing signification as such, even this impossibility that seems to dominate contemporary ideology to the point that it presumably affects it through and through (though in various ways) can quite easily be represented—and in fact does present itself—as a signification, since, ultimately, incompletion is the law of signification. Resigning oneself to separation and communion, relativism and unanimism, and so on (and everyor "semiotic" lessons that are as old as the promise or the undertaking of total and its function). When one is disenchanted with empires and history, one surprising, and yet disconcerting, to be endlessly told to return to those same so contemporaneous with the beginnings of our culture, and so intimately woven universe, to history, etc.), the rules of the game along with their variations are times, the imposition . . .) of a signification given to existence (and/or to the their possible combinations or distributions, whether contradictory or insipid. thing that might be called a philosophical macro-signification), as well as all tainty, resignation and will, playfulness and seriousness, wisdom and madness, and definitive meaning. In fact, all "philosophical lessons" are as old as the the absence of meaning, or rejoicing before that absence, are "philosophical" hearing them again, of being endlessly "schooled" in and ever "attentive" to On this level of our culture, everything takes place as if the contents of those of ideals or suspicion, one must return to one's own projects and vital energy must relearn the meaning of values or of mistrust; when, in turn, one is weary teachings (each one, in fact, having had at a given moment its raison d'être in a network of "ideas," "mentalities" or "attitudes," that it is at once not From the perspective of the "lesson," that is, of the proposition (and some-West: optimism and pessimism, skepticism and dogmatism, doubt and cerlessons mattered less than the mere fact of hearing them at all, or rather, of tion between the demand for philosophy and the mistrust or disdain for phitance, and philosophy is never found where one expects it. It is not in the moral, political, existential . . .). And, as expected, the signification of philososignification. It itself constitutes a signification conferred upon philosophyvises, indeed, even leads by example, is not only dependent on the thought of any proclamation of signification. orientation" and the eclecticism that takes the history of philosophy for a self losophy, just as there is a constant oscillation between the choice of a "philosophica" to the permanent Verstellung of value. This is why there is a constant oscilla-"philosophy of value," because philosophy itself is a value and therefore subject is, becomes its own incompletion. It is no longer simply a matter here of a its essence and its existence, so that it finally becomes that very promise, that it is always incomplete, always impossible to complete, always promising both philosopher's book, but neither is it in the ideal, or in life, or in the concept: phy obeys the general rule of signification; the signified is present-at-a-dis-(and, in this sense, a "philosophy" can take on many different forms: religious, that of being the place where significations are invented and communicated This presentation of philosophy as a discourse that announces, teaches, ad-

> projects the meaning of its teachings very far or very high. constant oscillation between the choice of a "philosophical orientation" and to the extent that it is "great," and that it is "great" to the extent that it the call to "great philosophy," it being understood that it is only "philosophy" service counter for all different kinds of ideas; and this is why there is also a ness of the impossibility of reaching and realizing it hic et nunc. wisdom, the desire to tend toward it in the intellectual and moral consciousnamely, "the love of wisdom." And the love of wisdom means the distance of signifying, the semantics at work when our Western semantics was emerging), the seventh century B.C., nor into our possibility of transcribing, that is, of further into the meaning of the significations that we attribute to the Greek of word mean what it in fact meant in Greek (that is, if one does not inquire history of a legend, or the legendary history of philosophy-would have this the philosophical vulgate, or one says in the philosophical koine, that such is indeed the meaning of the word "philosophy" itself. History and legend-the long time now, for as long in fact as there has been philosophy. One thinks in Such a signification of philosophy seems to us to have been established for a and the will to signification. depth of meaning beneath the sign), and, finally, the very idea of signification idea of meaning placed in another world (heaven, future, value-but also, the designate anything other than the general idea of presence-at-a-distance, the physics." By freely appealing to this technical term, Nietzsche did not make it from him, something that in itself clearly raises philosophical problems), "metaphilosophy. It represents philosophy in the sense of what one might call, with philosophy at a certain moment of philosophical rupture within the history of the signification in question has only formally emerged as the signification of dom" exhaust—and in what sense?—the meaning of "philosophy.") However, will return to this internal division [partage] of philosophy—always rejects the own significative legend. (On the other hand, philosophical thought-and I Nietzsche (and with those who, Heidegger being the first, borrowed this usage intimidation of legends. In this sense, it does not believe that "love" and "wisphilosophy, and of its self-understanding; philosophy, too, has elaborated its phy itself. It has certainly always been at least a part of the understanding of This signification of philosophy has certainly always accompanied philoso-

event or meaning that constituted the questions, works, and struggles of phi-Nietzsche himself knew this full well). It does not designate the reality of the philosophy from Plato to Nietzsche (despite all appearances to the contrary, this history came to understand itself, the way in which philosophy in its history losophers. Rather, it designates the way in which, from a certain point onward In this respect, "metaphysics" does not designate the effective history of course, existence, and signification the object of a new philosophical question. capricious variation or a pathological crisis.) of "making itself a question," was a necessary stage in its history and not a this putting into question, which should be understood in the strongest sense its signification into question; it put itself into question as signification, and (To forget philosophy is first to forget this: at a certain point philosophy put that is, in the history of the world as well-was led to make of its own dis-project. It is even twice doomed to this unhappiness. desire, that is, to the distance of projection and to the permanent return of the In this sense, "metaphysics" is by essence doomed to the unhappiness of

of representation. nor its aesthetic preoccupation, can change anything in this metaphysical economy vision, nor its power of comprehension or explication, nor its ethical demands, is always a viewed world: the object of a certain vision, referred back to the and insofar as it signifies at a distance. In this way, the world of a worldview subsisting, and self-relating activity of representation insofar as it is not the world, and neither is its representation. The subject signifies the autonomous, self-(the subject of meaning-the-world [vouloir-dire-le-monde]) is not of this world, of metaphysics is opaque, chaotic, or illusory. It takes on form and meaning itself of itself, or even, that is not the place of our existence. Indeed, the "world" view must be given is a world that is not present by itself, that does not give tion of the "world" and its "representation" or "view." A world of which a and donations of meaning), everything occurs a priori according to a disjuncsentation of the world14 (a representation from which are drawn promises, advice, Meaning is there present-at-a-distance, and if metaphysics claims to be a repreject stands in order to see the object. Neither the spiritual elevation of this latter's optic system, to its orientation, and to the distance at which the subin the subject's representation. But, as such, the subject of representation It is doomed a first time by virtue of the very structure of signification conception of the world-notwithstanding that this implies a conception of turn, which would no longer be a return, of the thing itself. That such is objects that they bring to view, projected on their screens-but never the reasked to do nothing other than to change our perspective [optique]. Returns are man, of reason, and, consequently, an infinite series of conceptions—we are mained in his own way dependent on the metaphysics of representation, each attested to by Nietzsche's laughter as well as by Marx's anger or Husserl's nevertheless the problem, at least in a preliminary and simple formulation, is always returns of optical systems, and of the objects or the perspectives on impatience in his injunction "Back to the things themselves!" If each has re-Thus, when we are asked to return some humane, rational, or reasonable > a close in its own desire for vision. sary as any other, though this epoch, in a way no less necessary, has come to although it is precisely this meaning that is at stake when it is a matter of are never thoughts of this: that the will to vision, conception, and signification "things," of their "existence," and our "experience" of them. Above all, they has been an epoch in the Western experience of the world, an epoch as necesthe signification of meaning, never thoughts of the meaning of signification, thoughts of vision, adaptation, correction, or clarification; they are thoughts of itself. On the contrary, the thoughts of the return to "meaning" are always has nevertheless indicated the moment at which, so to speak, it came up against

of the thoughts of crisis, or in crisis, with their morbid or snobbish taste for or even its "elitism" (to denounce this, the thoughts of the return surround ble: if philosophy gives meaning, to whom does it give it? the sacred obscurity of discourse, etc.). Consequently, the question is inevitathemselves with "social sciences" that dissect the psycho-sociological determinations prehensibility of philosophical discourse, its esotericism, indeed its hermeticism, 150 years, as those who think in terms of "crisis" like to claim) as the incomknown since the very beginning of philosophy (and not only for the last 50 or ability, that is, as the speaking animal). And yet nothing has been as well but also in accordance with the principle of signification itself; the signified must be signifiable for anyone who has the signifier at his (at least virtual) not only by virtue of a pedagogical, therapeutic, moral, or political demand. "Metaphysics" is doomed a second time to the unhappiness of desire in that its signifying message can reach practically none of its addressees. To the disdisposal, lest it not make sense (but metaphysics defines man through this availceive or recognize it. The philosopher speaks for man, for the human community, tance of meaning corresponds the distance of those who are supposed to reof putting it into question) is at stake in philosophical discourse—and metaphysics not exist, it is because something other than signification (if only the possibility discourse, "popularize" it (as was said in Kant's time, and as Kant himself order for philosophy, on the contrary, to be able to communicate that meancompete among each other more than they learn from one another . . .). In has always claimed—it is because this homology does not exist. But if it does "translation" inevitably "impoverishes" the philosopher's thought—as metaphysics ogy of signification—in meaning and structure—between the two languages. If to translate it into ordinary language. This would suppose a complete homolfeigned to wish for, while at the same time declaring himself incapable of it), ing to all men, it would have two options: it would have to reform its entire books, it is a lost cause (and doubly lost, for it is well known that philosophers As long as it gives it only to philosophers capable of reading philosophy is silent about this. Or else, it remains for the philosopher to declare that it is necessary to aim at the communication of meaning over a relatively long period of time. This communication itself thus becomes a value or an Idea, the Idea of the communication of the Idea... One may nonetheless wish to realize this Idea (thereby opening the era of the realization of all Ideas). It then becomes necessary to indicate and effectuate the necessary practical mediations: the reform or revolution of the polis, of customs or of language. But if these mediations take effect only little by little, they deprive of meaning all the generations that have not yet reached the historical, or transhistorical moment of communication. If, on the contrary, they take effect instantaneously, offering in one fell swoop the completed presence of Meaning, this is called the Terror. In each case, signified meaning remains present at a metaphysical distance, and the addressees of its message remain inaccessible to it.

42 / THE FORGETTING OF PHILOSOPHY

For these reasons, sometimes unavowed, sometimes half-recognized as inevitable inconveniences of the ideal character of meaning (of its signified or "meaningful" character), the thoughts of the return most often settle for a middle course. They practice a weakened philosophical discourse, make compromises with the accessible languages of advice or exhortation, and divert philosophical texts from their complexities and difficulties—which is to say, by keeping them from being thought through, they make them signify by any means (I here ignore the cases in which they are simply dishonest). Finally, they practice the Verstellung of discourse as much as that of its object.

The Exhaustion of Signification

Now, "metaphysics" does not exhaust the meaning of philosophy. That is, to suggest a first approximation of another meaning of the word "meaning," it does not exhaust philosophy's destination.

(It is difficult to be completely satisfied with this term, which Kant used philosophically. In Kant's work and beyond, this term remains at least partly bound to a systematics of signification. But it also indicates, in Kant's work, the movement of what is sent, thrown in a direction or into a meaning whose signification cannot be produced, and for which, perhaps, there is no signification to be produced. For Kant and beyond, it is man's and philosophy's privilege to have, indeed to be, a destination. I will not attempt here a further elaboration of the theme of destination as such. It will function as a simple index.)

and subjectivity. This might be called, by way of a metaphor drawn from tutes; the uniformly evasive presence of meaning constitutes its substantiality and in a perfect ontological identity with the subject whose meaning it constione there is) is situated at once in a constant and infinite presence-at-a-distance one might call the signification of signification, or the presentation—that is, itself as its own subject. Thus, the meaning of the subject (and this is the only to saying that the process or structure of signification recognizes and signifies philosophy simultaneously repeats and reflects, develops and closes the circle of in a different way, insistently right up to us and undoubtedly even beyondexhaustion of signification). It represents the total accomplishment of what the subject of signification recognizes itself as the ultimate signified. This amounts the appropriation of meaning. In its completed form, this circle is as follows: plishment, a fulfillment in plenitude. From Plato to Hegel—and then, though the representation—of meaning present-at-a-distance. This is indeed an accomhaust its signification (or, more precisely, "metaphysics" has designated the Metaphysics does not exhaust the meaning of philosophy, but it does exand inertia of signification. sciousness, the State or Value, Right, Force, Will, Work, Freedom, Art, Man. . . ; history" because it accomplishes all significations in the infinite subjectivity mechanics, the inertia of signification. It may bear the names: History, Conlike the dead incarnate God in the mad Nietzsche, it bears "all the names in only meaning is itself, in its inertia, that is, at once its own desire, its own event of metaphysics in its completion, that is, in its exhaustion. Signification about which it must be repeated that it has taken place, or that it is still taking exhaustion, which is designated by the death of God. The death of Godor future of meaning. projection, its own representational distance, and its own representation of distance becomes empty precisely because it completes [boucle] its subjective process; its death itself, without resurrection—the death of God is the advent and the ing in speaking this way, can only open up beyond that death, which is, like place today, and that anything "human" or "divine," if there is still any meaninsofar as this distance constitutes its essential property: the ideality, transcendence This is why the accomplishment of metaphysics constitutes as a result its

from the outset and by essence to the exhaustion of their signification. to recognize themselves under the heading of "nihilism," that is, as doomed preceded it. Nietzsche's age is the age when all the projects of Humanity come sible to return without an upheaval so deep that it prevents all return to what empty glimmer of projection itself. This is an event from which it is not posall its projections (Truth, Goodness, Value, Humanity . . .), reflects only the about the despondency and aberration that takes hold of a reflection that, in Nietzsche knew, to the point of madness (and perhaps Hegel before him)

eaesura that everywhere inscribes the open rift of signification: in world war one's time, or for one's time. For the reality of this time lies entirely in the community return), the fact that this happened to our time as its destinaof Socratism return, or industrial society could make the meaning of the Christian could make the meaning of Egypt return, or Christianity could make the meaning meaning could never consist in a return of "meaning" (no more than Plato another history which opens up before us beyond signification, a history whose sura or syncope of signification—and that this inevitably delivers us over to "meaning" has itself been suppressed, has at least this deep scansion, this caeextermination, exploitation, hunger, technology, art, literature, philosophy... recognizing. Without such a recognition, it is strictly impossible to try to think tion—this is what the thoughts of the return make themselves incapable of does not mean that it is alone on this path . . .), the fact that history, whose The fact that this event has happened, and that it is still under way (which

This event is so hard to ignore that many feel obliged to admit that some-

nification. The "end of ideologies" is an underhanded notion by means of which has reached the maturity and gained the power necessary to judge itwhich one tries to select from what history has judged-that is, from that the embarrassed, roundabout admission that something has happened. its presuppositions. But at the same time, it represents a kind of admission, ideological idea par excellence, in the sense that it wants to know nothing of been "ideological." In this regard, the idea of the "end of ideologies" is an self-in order to leave itself a way out for a return of what would not have tion: the will to signify finds itself confronted with the bare projection of sigour philosophical discourse has come to measure itself against its own exhausto regret—though only a bit—the loss of a certain generosity that sometimes half-recognition; one thereby avoids recognizing that the entire structure of tion of the fantasies of thought. In truth, this recognition is only a hypocritical gave color to these "ideologies," but on the whole one gladly notes the exhaustury that it is fashionable to regard with disdain . . .). At times one may claim derangement of good sense and an obscuring of its lights (that nineteenth censophical deviations or fixations that arose because of a kind of temporary tual excrescences, of gratuitous or maniacal speculations, or simply of philothus have oneself believe that our era has buried a certain number of intellecthe whole history of the philosophical significations of this word). One would proclaimed "the end of ideologies" (in defiance, we should note in passing, of thing has indeed happened in our recent history, something that they have

4 4

The West at Its Ends

What actually happened [arrive] did not happen in a day. 15 And just as this occurrence [arrivee] is not yet over, so it did not begin in 1789 or 1830. It began with the beginning of metaphysics, the slow and difficult recognition of which was revealed to us by Nietzsche, Marx, Kierkegaard, Husserl, Freud, Bergson, Wittgenstein, Benjamin, and Heidegger; the West was destined to designate its destiny as "margnhysics" designate its destiny as "metaphysics."

"Metaphysics" is not a deviant part of philosophy (as suggested when one concedes that it is probably necessary to criticize certain aspects of metaphysical "dogmatism," "idealism" or "rationalism"). Insofar as metaphysics is that which philosophy reveals itself as in its completion, it is indeed philosophy itself. Philosophy, that is, the occidental mode of thought, or else its disoriented—and for that reason signifying—mode, was initiated from the outset as metaphysics, while initiating by this very gesture the possibility and potential of manifesting itself as different from metaphysics, or manifesting an essential difference within metaphysics itself: the difference in meaning, or the difference of meaning, which is, in fact, the sole object of what I am attempting to explain here.

There is no sense—neither direction nor signification—in wanting to "go back" to before metaphysics. There is nothing "before" the West, if the very idea of the "before" is already caught in a network of metaphysical significations (the prior, the causal, the archaic, the primitive, the originary, the native, the repressed, the forgotten, the recalled, etc.). And yet, the West has taken place; it has happened and there was not nothing when and where it happened; but its occurrence consisted in signifying that the "before" was lost, that it was this lost meaning (Egypt, the gods, Homer, Solon...) and that the process of signification was initiated on the basis of this loss (or else, which amounts to the same thing, that meaning remained mute, unarticulated, not yet signified and presented). What has happened is the will to give (back) meaning, or some kind of meaning: logos, the "-logy" in general.

This occurrence [arrivée] has reached [arrivée] its ends. To reach its ends or necessity of this accomplishment (without having the metaphysical sense of the an unsignifiable limit of signification something that appears as the reality and is itself in no way nihilistic. Nihilism means that signification infinitely escapes signification by completing the history of nihilism. Yet this very accomplishment encounter), and, consequently, to encounter there that which exceeds its signiof logos, the surprising mark of its own power. It has the capacity to encounter on the demand for meaning has to go through the exhaustion of significations. to resign ourselves to their annulment, but rather to understand that from now signification but a quantity of movement: the élan, departure, or sending of a we can gather or welcome the fact that, in the impact, it imparts to us not a real or the necessary); we can encounter the fact that this happens to us, and tion of signification accomplished by the West. We can, however, encounter at If we seek to grasp the signification of the West, we run up against the exhauscause our idea of necessity, just like our idea of freedom, is bound to signification. dent-even though we are not in a position to understand its "necessity" bewould not have taken place, and the Occident is not an unfortunate accithe entire signifiable meaning of logos. Without this accomplishment, the Occident itself, but the accomplishment as such accomplishes the meaning of signification, fication. The logos that has reached its ends has enclosed the general space of itself at its own limit (in the end, perhaps I am speaking here only of this to be capable of coming to its own end is perhaps the most distinctive feature the West in its accomplishment asks us neither to revive its significations nor destination. And this destination presents itself in at least the following way:

signified meaning, that is, of a meaning that is immobile, inaccessible, or else system and history of signification have come to signify their own annulment, art for art's sake, and the total man, and so on have. But in the end, the tined us, just as democracy, axiomatics, the critique of reason, human rights, nification. Christianity and empiricism have led us to ourselves, they have desand void. They had their meaning, they cleared the way for this destination infinitely evasive, thus slowly becoming, as if before our very eyes, insignificant. turning upon themselves only to reveal the infinite withdrawal [eloignement] of that leads beyond them without itself, perhaps, leading toward some other sig-This exhaustion does not imply that all significations will have been null reason"—which, in the final analysis, says about the philosopher nothing es while the idea of his legislation is to be found everywhere in all of human devouring. When Kant declared that "the philosopher is to be found nowhere vision] of the final meaning was none other than the replica of this infinite always already happened, and because the sighting [visée] or fore-sight [préto signification arose against the background of a loss of meaning that had There was this end—or at least, this end began to happen—because the will > sacrificed to the superhumanity or to the inhumanity of the Subject of this the People, the Race, Science, Technology, the Church, History, Art. . . . ultimate signification, which can take on all sorts of guises: the Philosopher, bedazzlement or the naked horror of impossible Meaning-and real man is philosophy as metaphysics. Humanism is henceforth that which makes man the philosopher man that constitutes the end, in all senses of the word, of the return). It is the end-lessness of the will-to-signify (or present or realize) of "philosophy," the reasonable image that is also proposed by the thoughts of seek and discuss anew (we recognize here the most commonly accepted image ing able to go beyond discussion, and which, consequently, it must always still observation (despite a tone of resignation at the impossibility of meeting the always reaches in fragments and symbols, which it communicates without beitself from a distance. This law is so because the idea of philosophy that is here "legislation": namely, that its proper and ultimate signification only ever presents Master of Meaning . . .); rather, he exposed the very law of this metaphysical flee. In the end, he finds himself dumbfounded, faltering before the violent longer desire it). It is the Idea of philosophy as a search for meaning, which it implied is precisely the idea of willing signification (the "philosopher" need no sentially different from what Plato was saying—he did not make a resigned

a subject. This is a double will that closes metaphysics upon itself, and that it tween the "worse" and the "better"), but it must be understood how the worst chosen, on the contrary (and this is precisely what allows one to decide bea return to Candide rather than to Kant. But above all, its pitiful content hanging on the fleeing of Meaning, in the same metaphysical closure. was and remains possible in the name of Meaning, and how the best remains the worst as well as through the best; it is not that there is nothing to be destination through all that the West has signified and brought about, through is important to recognize as such. That is, it is important to recognize our the Subject wants to gain a Meaning, Meaning wants to feed on the desire of distance fall back on one another, endlessly exchanging their properties, and if alters nothing; in the will to signification, the presence of Meaning and its reduced to this: "one must signify, but not too much.".... This paltry lesson is Kant is then the model and the panacea, which means that his thought is critical demand for the distance one should keep with regard to the absolute; opens onto the end of signification) and what, on the other hand, would be a ian signification (Hegel is most often taken as the model for this, even though it is precisely in his work that the passage to the limit of the system decidedly was supposed to have been an excessive and dogmatic imposition of a totalitarwanting to distinguish and select within metaphysics what, on the one hand, The negligence or thoughtlessness of the thoughts of the return consist in

10

Being Exposed to the Limit

Need we specify that this "closure" does not mean that metaphysics is closed like an abandoned building? Rather, it is wide open, opened by its very completion and by the power that makes the logos confront by itself its end and limit. Metaphysics in every way calls for interrogation, inquiry, and doubt, in order to bring to light the play [jeu] and the stakes [enjeu] of the destination to which it has destined us. We have not gotten out of philosophy; we are in it the moment when, and the move by which, the signifying will knows itself as such, knows itself to be insignificant, and by itself releases a new demand for "meaning."

bility for a closure of signification, for the payment of an infinite debt to worldviews. Their discourses in one way or another always take the responsimost proper articulation, decision, and power of philosophy: its exposure to copula, this and—which functions at the same time as a caesura—contains the and, just as necessarily, just as inevitably, comes apart and exceeds itself. This West, the system of signification comes together and comes to a completion might believe. It has arisen and emerged from within philosophy for as long as ibly modern or "postmodern" consequences, is not as unprecedented as one philosophy itself turned back on its limit, sometimes to the point of or forcing its possibilities (such are today the broadest stakes of all that exposes "worldview" without at the same time attempting to indicate the limit of all the limit of meaning. Neither Plato, nor Descartes, nor Kant ever proposed a there has been philosophy. Since that time, and throughout the history of the unrecognition . . .). But this demand, right up to and including the most vistures, arts and literatures that break down the use of signs, but also, and still, constant task of passing to the limit of this discourse, of diverting, laying bare, philosophy to its limits: non-Western realities, the autonomy of techno-strucalready imposes, within the discourse of signification, the indeterminate but insofar as it expressly "signifies" the limit of signification, and consequently This demand is new precisely insofar as it now frees itself from signification

52 / THE FORGETTING OF PHILOSOPHY

Meaning, and for the opening of a breach or an excess, the abandonment of the debt and its economy. For that matter, it is in this, and in this alone, that one recognizes "great" philosophies; they are never simply worldviews, they are never simply signifying messages. And it is also to this that we owe their aporias or enigmas, and along with them, the real, effective history of philosophy: Plato's Good or Love, Descartes's evidence, Spinoza's joy, Kant's schematism, Hegel's logic, Marx's praxis, and so on.

In one sense, we find here a constant renewal, but this is precisely why it is futile to call for the "return." The West always returns within the West, it always returns to its limit. But this is how it accomplishes itself and how, by bringing to light the limit as such, by manifesting its repetition, it achieves its ends. The planetary, and now interplanetary, reality exposes this to us every day. Every day it exposes to us the fact that we are a little more exposed to the limit. To philosophize is not to reactivate the signs and significations that are in the process of being consumed in this exposure; it is, rather, to think the exposure itself.

Philosophy has no doubt defined itself from its inception as the desire or the will to signify, but it has also determined itself from its inception according to the demand of a meaning that is in excess of signification. It destines itself, and it destines us, to encounter this demand that we expose ourselves to it. By accomplishing and exhausting the system of signification, it accomplishes itself, exhausts itself, and destines itself always more rigorously to this encounter. To ignore this is to forget philosophy.

going toward a future whose meaning we would project but are instead making such, for we then "will be" elsewhere, and we will not know it anymore than end of exhaustion-to the point of no longer being able to recognize it as of history and of the future-and yet it happens . . .), when we "are" at the presents itself in the very present of the exhaustion; it recalls this time to itself philosophy from itself and to call for "another" thought. The other though does not exceed the present time of philosophy, even when it seems to divide does not come from signification. This task is always a philosophical one. It ourselves present to what never fails to happen, to what is always to come and ourselves available for the thought of our time—and, to this extent, we are not is indeed why we do not have to signify a "future," but, rather, have to make and "another demand for meaning" themselves no longer have any meaning. This cease to happen), then, at that moment, "the demand for another meaning" it may well be that we are already elsewhere, it may well be that it does not the first Westerners knew that they had already initiated the West (this is why its history (if there is any sense in speaking this way: it is perhaps not a matter Of course, this means that when this accomplishment will have completed

The Simple Truth

tion of representation as such. and yet they nonetheless tended, as toward their own end, toward a presentafication—and not without a certain risk—by opposing countervalues to values, tion. These claims could have themselves, in turn, joined in the game of signiand heterogeneity have all converged upon the coming of a moment that is all of the work of art, of the event, as well as discontinuity, the now, obscurity, existence, practice, the world, experience, the truth of appearances, of the body, not immaterial that a hundred different ways of reclaiming immediacy, life, replace another that is reputed to be illusory, impotent, or obsolete. Yet it is some invocation of Existence), it is merely one more signification claiming to the more historic for having punctuated our history by suspending its significathe example of Feuerbach, or of a certain modern idea of Myth, or else of in its place, for when such a presentation has been attempted (one might give practical, or living, that has presented itself in opposition to representation or tation has presented itself as such. It is not another presence, be it immediate, the limit as such. It is, as it were, to bring signification to its limit. Represen-The reality of our time, the actuality and necessity of our present, is to present

(A lot has been said about a moment in this history—May 1968—when there was, at least in part, a sort of fleeting acting out to find this moment or movement. Much fun has been made of this, for one often makes fun of what one is incapable of understanding. But its truth was simply this: one presented—sometimes candidly—representation [political, social, academic, spectacular, artistic]; one demonstrated its closure; one said—sometimes naively—one's goodbyes to signification. For a moment, the joyous cry of "let imagination rule," despite its postromantic pathos, had the meaning, the fragment or spark of meaning, of a passage to the limit of signification.)

What was a happening¹⁷ in 1968 is still happening to us, contrary to what the doctors or guardians of the (in)significant order believe, who see in this a mere crisis that has already passed. Rarely, no doubt, since the end of Rome, accomplishment of metaphysics as the will-to-signify. our crisis, the crisis of our actual history, in that it determines and judges the is indeed a crisis (of which the thoughts of the return are a symptom)—it is to itself as in its relations with the "Third World" and the "Fourth World." It ward the last resources of its significations, as much in the relation of the West has a civilization or a culture experienced to such an extent the inclinatio to-one, but which, instead of mediating presence and distance by way of one such a function that philosophy henceforth determines as its nihilism: a movean asymptotic approximation of signification. But it is the very meaning of of the point; its null identity can engender the infinite, hyperbolic function of presence and distance. One can always think of the dialectical sublation [releve] is thus the point of its identity. It is defined by the intersection, if you will, of divides it from itself: Meaning's presence-at-a-distance. This point of division against a bad and morbid philosophy. But philosophy is led before that which healthy philosophy (one that would be nondogmatic, critical, relative, etc.) signification). This determination does not call for a recovery of a good and but to bring it to light as the limit, which it represents, of the thought of critique, but the givens are different; the task is not to clarify the schematism itself. (In this sense, there is indeed a repetition of something like the Kantian another movement whose style [allure] might perhaps be similar to the preceding truth of presence. We must then open up, for this point, the possibility of ment toward presence through distance, and the engendering of distance as the another, would sweep away the entire system of this mediation, severing it from its aim and allowing another function or figure of philosophy to be traced out. In and by the crisis, philosophy is judged, and therefore led to determine has happened: Benjamin, Heidegger, and Wittgenstein (I understand that these most recent history, perhaps three names are the principal witnesses to what expression of this testimony might be found in this saying of Benjamin's: "truth cessity, and inscribes us in turn in the necessity to follow. The most direct for the entire network of names they entail: Nietzsche and Marx, Bataille and names could serve both as the thoughts that they sign and as a kind of signal trasted singularities, which inscribes them in one and the same historical necommon testimony, which neither suppresses nor transcends their sharply contween their ways of thinking. I simply wish to indicate their essential and three thinkers, nor their differences-sometimes great-nor the relations be-Malevitch and Weber, and many others). I do not intend to examine these Proust, Hölderlin and Baudelaire, Apollinaire and Joyce, Frege and Einstein. This is what takes place. In the crisis, signification is swept away. In our

Truth is not of the order of intention, of the aim that seeks to uncover.

what presents our history to us—is that it be presence before being signification. of language games, what is important here—and this is what makes history, being as it conceals itself, or whether it offers the Wittgensteinian multiplicity calls "ideas," or whether it consists, as in Heidegger, in the unconcealment of coming of this presence. Whether the latter be what Benjamin in his idiom ment. One might say that truth is a simple presentation, and the simple welcomes to presence, that is to say, comes to itself and to us in the same moveas the coming into presence of a presence; something, which by itself is neither end the condition of possibility of its presentation—at a distance). It is defined which is true is not a correspondance between the presentable and its presenpresentable nor unpresentable, which neither offers itself to nor evades signs, rather, it is the bursting forth of a presence. This presence is thus no longer tation, which will always keep what is presented at a representational distance; tion, and that the unpresentability of Truth in itself even constitutes in the generosity-rises beyond this desire, having no further relations with it. That ereignty of what was desired-the splendor of the true, its necessity, its (and we know that for metaphysics both are ultimately presentable in significadefined as a (re)presentation of the presentable, no more than of the unpresentable tifies to is, in sum, the fact that truth is freed from these conditions; the sovconditions define the subjectivity, whether transcendent or operative, by and of possibility and production. The appropriation and implementation of these short, governs presentation. Truth-true meaning-requires its own conditions for which there is signification. What, on the contrary, Benjamin's saying testion—which is its signification. In this logic, "presentability" precedes and, in to be presentable, and this will already constitutes the essence of its presentaing other than what metaphysical truth wants to be, but without this very ence, emerge. It is no longer a question of calibrating an intentionality [visée] but of letting the thing present itself "in truth." In a sense, this truth is noth-But as a result, it makes another meaning of presentation, or at least of presof desire or of the will to meaning. On the contrary, it puts an end to them. It puts an end to presence-at-a-distance, and to the reign of its presentation. reconstitute, or constitute a signification. It is not of the order of the project, l. 18 As we saw, for philosophy represented as metaphysics, truth wants (itself)

at a distance. To think this correlation, or perhaps better yet, this co-belongis not signification, for the latter, precisely insofar as it signifies, keeps presence entation is thought in an essential correlation with language. This correlation each of these witnesses, and here again, despite their extreme differences, presold obsessive fear of metaphysics, which is but another side of its desire). For ing of language and presence, that is, in the end, to think another meaning of Of course, it is not a question of putting the thing in place of the sign (an offers itself in a co-belonging with presence that sets thought a new task. It is raised the question of language as an unprecedented and fundamental quesof things (or of language itself). It is a matter of questioning truth as somefication by leaving all things at a meaning's distance.) But it is a matter now of Nameless is but a name, one that allows the completion of the whole of signiunderstood as a tool of signification. When this is no longer the case, language secondary—at least if one simplifies matters by forgetting the actual place they anything about the fact that the problems of language could appear minor or as much divorced from reality as it is from values. They don't want to know question, in which they see only the rhetorical rash of a reflection that is just tion. The thoughts of the return would not mind going back to before this disappears; it is rather presence that withdraws into itself. tance, it lets presentation be [laisse faire]. When something presents itself, nothing withdraws from language. But this withdrawal does not put anything at a disthat is, also, something that withdraws from the thing, and something that thing of the thing in language, and as something of language in the thingwhat linguistic presentation would not be an instrument for the signification inquiring what presentation of the thing would not be an end of language, and a muted and constant nominalism, positing language in this way? Even the ing functioning. (Isn't it ultimately metaphysics that always ends up, through be to posit it in terms of signification, as the exclusive referent of the signifynot a matter of claiming that it itself becomes the sole reality; this would still occupied from the very dawn of philosophy . . . —only as long as language was language. This is the historical necessity of the exhaustion of signification that meaning, demands that one put back into question an entire understanding of

When you introduce yourself [te présentes], when you name yourself, this has no signification; it is not a concept joined to an intuition; there is neither distance nor intimacy; it is not a representation, nor is it sheer indetermination, since you stand out from both the world and significations. What happens there, in a sense, does not take place as long as it is not repeated and does not enter into an ensemble of significative relations. It does not take place because it is first of all the presentation of a place: that of your presence and your nomination. It is a very simple truth, even a very humble one. It in no way replaces all other "truths," but these truths are worth no more than their significations if there is not this simple truth. Our era is a testimony to the fact that this truth—which for the moment probably does not mean much—demands to be thought.

We Are Meaning

sentation" itself, or else out of the word "truth," something must come to present communitarian, indeed, civic. One might also say-and this time, it would sions that do or do not engage us (in certain ways) in the exchange or in the of communication; rather, it would be a question-but here again, how is this "signifiance," by those of the pragmatics of enunciation, or the psychosociology something else. For you [toi], for all of you [vous], it will present itself perhaps itself that traces the limit of all its meanings, and yet still makes you hear instead resemble a pathetics, or "logic of emotions"—that out of the word "presharing out of these words and discourses, whose stakes are by nature public, word to be understood?—of a politics of philosophy, of the choices and decireferent. But this "between us" would not be exhausted by the codes of "meaning" and yet is always present on its borders. I might attempt to say that course and of words, of you to me, of one to another, that is irreducible to of significations in all discourse, and which is perhaps a "presentation" of disfectly clear translations), and all this signifies that which borders the meaning nothing precise signified here (though one can, of course, reduce it all to pererasure or musical notation, like a sketch or a discharge of energy; there is to write it here in a way that would be not simply the communication of a order to give it a new meaning, at least not in this sense; it is, rather, in order this meaning takes place between us and not between signifier, signified, and meaning but the exposition of a thing, and a kind of call, or wink, a sort of it this time because of certain philosophical privileges it has or had, it is not in the use I make of it) in order to go elsewhere, toward other words. If I choose here (whose every signification undoubtedly conceals a trap or an impasse for answer of those whose testimony I use. "Presentation": I employ this word asked: what, however, does presentation signify? I will not elude the question is not a question of replacing it but of exposing oneself to its limits-I will be by answering that presentation has no meaning—and this has never been the Since I am speaking the discourse of signification—for there is no other, and it already established or that are to be invented; it is a matter of how the words communication of idioms, of rules that either are or are not common, that are or both, philosophical work is not a combinatory network of significations; it touch us with the edges of their meanings. Whether it be political or pathetic only in other texts, with other words: it is a matter of style or tone, of the tion, where there occurs, always unpredictable and free, always new like history ment that carries itself or lets itself be carried away to the limits of significabuilds concepts and links reasons only in order to make possible the movemore than this: meaning at the limit of signification. itself, that "existence in truth of the thing known" which Plato considered the last degree of knowledge. What I am attempting to "signify" here is nothing

It means that the signified "reality" or the signified "fact" is caught in the earlier origin in Montaigne): "there are only interpretations of interpretations." with the Nietzschean theme so much in fashion some time ago (which has an exhaustion. The reactive thoughts do not miss an opportunity to take issue word of the West-and it is also the master-word of its disenchantment and distance of meaning in the metaphysical order. Interpretation is the mastername of signification. This name clearly and openly designates the irreducible entirely to the system. Ultimately, interpretation is even the most advanced interpretation of signification itself as interpretation, for interpretation belongs new interpretation of the system of signification. Nor does it consist in an one has not thought the presentation of a fact at the limit of signification. For as opposed to "interpretations" is already caught in interpretation, so long as ing to the order of signification. Specifically, it means that appealing to "facts" circle and the distance of signification, so long as meaning is thought accordnot mean that there are no realities or facts other than those of interpretation. But this is to refuse to understand that this phrase, in the final analysis, does physics of language is condemned to an infinite chain of interpretations. Nietzsche, there were indeed facts, and one of these was the fact that the meta-This would first mean, at least, that such a meaning does not consist in a in sum, already to signify a kind of asymptotic exhaustion of signification and as a historical process, and this process in turn as a continual deciphering (alous and acute, of the thoughts of value and humanism). To consider meaning spite everything, the denial of it (forming a kind of variant, often more generone hand, a recognition of the closure of signification, and, on the other, despread in the Anglo-Saxon countries than in France) that constitutes, on the to indicate that meaning (the meaning of the process itself, and the meaning of ways renewed and revived) of always unstable or incomplete significations, is, the hermeneutical move) lies elsewhere. But it is also to hold this meaning-Hermeneutics is the name of a general thought of interpretation (more wide-> world, of history, and of the subject of meaning. The deep structure of signirenewed; and it is also to propose, in the logic of this distance, a view of the the infinite source or renewal of meaning—at a distance that is itself always is, first of all, to be presented, to present itself. The "message"—a term that activity that is more proper to it than to other discourses); rather, it presents make meaning and does not confer significations (or at least this is not an nified on its borders, as it were, by the modalities of its presentation. Such may come to accompany, even contaminate, its signification, affecting the siging—although, in another sense, the messenger's bearing, his style and his own carrier. The messenger is not the signification of the message, nor is he its sion of a message, of the announcement of news and of its forwarding by a fication" of the Greek word hermeneuein proposed by Heidegger, who, offering a point so fine that this very thought often forgets it, even though it leads to it—is a signification with an address, that is, a destination and a presentation. that the entire modern interrogation of the literary function has relied upon has long connoted the idea of a signification so rich with reasons and projects meaning, and it presents it because the meaning of meaning, before all signification, would be the first meaning [valeur] of "presentation": philosophy does not relation to the content of the message (which he may not know, or understand interpreter; he does not give it any meaning and he does not give its meanits oldest meaning as its newest, understood it as the meaning of the transmisit and even arrives at it-something that challenges or pierces interpretation from within. This is revealed particularly in the "interpretation" of the "signi-There is, however, at the finest point, as it were, of hermeneutical thought-

essential in common with the Benjaminian idea of translation as well as with the Wittgensteinian theme of showing as opposed to explaining.) (This limit of hermeneutics drawn out by Heidegger certainly has something it is to this, precisely, that one cannot return; for bygone history contains for significations; it is the system of their presentation and the limit of their meanprogress, already present or yet to be won. Meaning is the possibility of is not that meaning takes place within signification and through it, but that ings. It is with this, today, that thought finds itself inevitably confronted—and not a signification, whether determinate or indeterminate, completed or still in makes meaning, but the opposite. Meaning in this sense is not a meaning; it is pretations, representations. It is not language, nor the logos in general, that meaning is on the contrary the element in which there can be significations, interwith which we are unavoidably confronted and that our history presents to us, ing into presence-preexists signification and exceeds it. The truth, that truth This first of all means that meaning—understood as presentation or as com-

7

us only significations. That which, on the other hand, is of the order of meaning is the fact that history took place [se soit passée] and that it has passed [soit passée]; this means, for instance, that it presents itself to us as this gigantic [Western trajectory of signification that has come to rest on and expose itself to its limit.

tion before having any signification. Ours is a world that is presented as a nificant world is a world offered to understanding, explanation, or interpretaing"-and capable of it unconditionally. The elementarity of meaning is thus is our ownmost possibility, it is in the sense that we are "capable of meanample, before and beyond the meanings of the word "world" as well as the one that distinguishes the idea of a significant world and the fact of this world agrees with the philosopher at least in this: the element of meaning is given to up of signifying phonemes. There is no meaningful provenance of meaningof signification, just as signifying words, as Plato already noted, are not made not a primitive origin of signification. It is not made up of primitive elements to the schematism, it does not constitute an operation, nor a "hidden art"; it is of meaning, occupies, as it were, the place of the schematism. But, as opposed word "man." This presentation of its meaning, or in meaning, this elementarity world of meaning before and beyond any constituted meaning-and, for exsimultaneously the bare outline of a logic and the thickness of a flesh. A sigand simultaneously empirical and transcendental, material and ideational, physical from any other, since, in this case, such a fact is strictly contemporaneous with us; we are posited, placed, or thrown into it as into our ownmost possibility nor is there a meaningless provenance, for this would still presuppose meaning. that idea, that is, since the element of meaning is a reality that is undiscernibly very level of our existence. elements could assign, it is also something perfectly uncovered, offered at the all. This is why, if meaning is an element more deeply buried than any logic of Quite simply, there is no provenance of meaning it presents itself, and that is not the condition of the possibility or of the production of significations. If it and spiritual—an unprecedented kind of "fact of reason" that would manifest The semiotician, by speaking for example of signifiance or "semiogenesis, Producing significations has all sorts of functions: practical, technical, moral, social, political, and philosophical as well. There is some meaning in initiating all these functions, but they do not constitute it: they are caught up in it and testify to it. In this way, meaning is first of all that by which, or rather that in which, or even that as which, there is a being [être] of meaning or an entity [existant] whose existence is by itself, from the outset, in the element of meaning, before all signification. One might call this being man—but one would have to be able to separate this word from its significations (has not this sepahis proposition to the fact—which is, here again, inextricably empirical and Descartes himself is not far from saying this when he ascribes the evidence of this is a signification), and before cogito, the ego is caught in the element of we; all, the possibility of saying I. One could in fact show that, at the point where same thing), would there be the possibility of saying we-and even, and above subject of enunciation, but the word "we" would be-or we would be-the the Cartesian ego is still suspended just before all signification, before sum (if Only in this opening, that is, "in us" or "between us" (which here means the meaning of meaning, the very opening of meaning, and meaning as opening. element of meaning as such. In the final analysis, it would not even be a would be something like the general communication (one might also say: the ciation of what is not yet even a statement (with its signification), but which general performativity, or the general pragmatics . . .) that is inherent in the some particular signification. We consists, if you will, in the subject of enunother than the possibility that this community elaborates some particular signification, as well as the possibility for this community to confer upon itself munity of meaning sets itself in motion as community, which still means nothing dealing, for example, with something "molar" or "collective"). We: the com-(otherwise, outside of meaning or in the order of signification, one would be mon, and that which is common takes place only in the element of meaning that enunciates itself, that "shifts itself," as it were; meaning can only be com fied "community" in general. It is, rather, the common belonging to meaning tion. Here, for now, we does not signify any community, not even the signielement of meaning. As we know, as a linguistic "shifter," we has no significaeven refrain from signifying it as "a being," by simply saying that we are in the Finally, one might give up, at least for a time, trying to name this being, and merely uses it as a word; I do not here want to dwell further on this question). signification at the limit, though this question remains hidden as long as one mental question indicated by the word Dasein from being the question of a ance of problems of signification (specifically, it does not prevent the fundaproduction of analyses that this makes possible does not prevent the reappearto name this being otherwise, as Heidegger did with Dasein, and the entire would have to be able to separate the meaning of "man"). One might also try signification and humanism, for what is ultimately said in each context is that same time, in each case, the movement to the limit falls back into the logic of supreme essence of man," brought the signification of this essence—as well as "man" is for himself his own signification: ultimately, it is from this that one the signification of the word "essence" in general-to the limit? But at the the question, What is man? and ever since Marx, by declaring that "man is the ration been on the horizon ever since Kant declared that one could not answer

transcendental—that we all experience our existence, and that it is this cerits philosopheme. tainty alone, which we all already share, that can impart to us the evidence of singular existences, whose singularity is each time the place of such a presentaourselves to ourselves. That is to say, at once to one another, through one mon element of meaning in which only that which takes place in this way can tion (it is "collective" only in a secondary and derivative way) and the com-I say "we" in this sentence, I designate equally and indissociably each of our exchanges of meaning, our existence presents itself to us as meaning-and when appearing [parution] is meaning. another, and each one to him or herself. We co-appear [comparaissons], and this ignoble, etc.-it does not matter for now), and simultaneously, we present present itself as nonmeaning, as meaning that is weak or powerful, eternal or take place. Our existence presents itself as meaning (which can just as soon We are meaning. Before all produced or disclosed meaning, and before all

It proceeds as an exposure; we are exposed, that is our being-or the meaning takes place, unceasingly, through innumerable significations. It does not proin the element of meaning. This presentation itself has no signification; it only "coming" or a "coming to pass": that of our co-appearing, of our presentation ontology that is yet to come, which does not mean that it will come, but that ceed as the recognition or the identification of those-we-who are presented it is perhaps, in itself, as thought, ordered according to the dimension of a we before all anthropology, all humanism, and all antihumanism, calls for an This we of meaning, which is meaning, this meaning that is the being of the

at each moment, for each of us, this exposure takes place. Without this, we without possibility of return, to new tasks. But this meaning is not to be sought thought that places meaning in signification, and in signifying that we are led West-just as there is now some meaning in signifying the exhaustion of the of meaning—or at least, there has been and there will be as long as we are the some sense in signifying, there is some sense in initiating projections and projects no more put meaning at issue than denotation would). There is, therefore, their meaning at issue than would a numeration (for, in fact, numeration would mere indication or a mere denotation of things, which would no more put cation, more powerful or more primordial. Rather, it is that without this expomight signify to ourselves. Clearly, it is not that it constitutes another signifitakes place before all signification, before all ideality or all finality that we would not exist. It is, as they say, as necessary to us as the air we breathe. It sure no signification would have any meaning, for any signification would be a This means nothing other, at least for the moment, than this: here and now, in significations, which, on the contrary, find their possibility of meaning in it.

×

the thoughts of the return to "law" and "values" would like to do today. contrary to what the theodicies, then the dialectics, used to do, and to what exorcising signification, and requires one to open the question of evil anew, not give it a meaning, but forbids one from classifying it under a restorative or egory of the senseless, which can constitute another kind of signification. The other, into "good," but neither does it invite us to set it aside under the catwe ward off, in vain, or else contemplate, blindly, that end of signification called death. Or else, love. Or else, in the fact that the only thing we underfact that evil arises in the element of meaning—in us and between us—does the least invite us to give meaning to evil by converting it, in one way or the may have signified. For example—but this is a prime example—it does not in now on hold us back from taking refuge in a return to what these significations ble, wretched or atrocious evil. That there is meaning in this sense explains or prevent us from being exposed, or from exposing ourselves, to the most ignofication. Or, in the fact that no signification of the "good" or the "just" can stand about the signification marked "political" is an excess or a lack of signijustifies nothing, but it does hold back our significations, and it must from to ourselves what is called "art," a name that is perhaps nothing more than an signification. Or else, in the sense in which there is some sense in presenting immense question about signification in general. Or else, in the sense in which which we are in the world, feeling pleasure and pain, without this having any There is some sense, so to speak, in the meaning of the five senses through order. That is why this presentation at the limit is an exposure; presence withas the presence of a signification in the poetic or philosophical inauguration of draws from it as surely as the present of a time that comes and goes, as surely ence at a distance, signification holds us back before it, immobile. But the us to meaning and which presents meaning to us, we are spared being caught evidences, certainties, and assurances (there can also be a full assurance in the meaning offered at the limit of signification takes us into the movement of a in the presence that results from signification. For insofar as it holds that pressions, in the event of our significations. Through this exposure, which presents ourselves as a time, to language, to ourselves [nous-mêmes], that is, to us others arising of meaning), but, more deeply, a rupture of signification itself and its presentation to ... which is a rupture of presence itself: not only a rupture of [nous autres],19 to evil, to good, to choice, to decision, to choices and deciit is us as exposed, to a space and to ourselves as a space, to a time and to some dull necessity. It is made up of a permanent stake, that of being exposed; it neither has nor gives signification, makes it neither nonmeaning nor fate nor The fact that meaning in this sense infinitely exceeds signification, and that a language. This presence is thus not deferred as if it were postponed to a later date and to another place (this, on the contrary, is what signifying thought endlessly proposes); it presents itself, instead, in the difference with itself, because meaning is nothing other than this infinite hollowing out of presence, which is the possibility and even the most proper nature of its coming, that by which we are exposed to it—by which we are.

64 / THE FORGETTING OF PHILOSOPHY

weak sense of diversity, which demands its moral recognition but cares little also, in the continuing variations upon the requisite plurality, one pluralism, a what is demanded is an identification of man, right, good, or meaning, and of the possibility of identifying anything. The return is always proposed as sible, and by inscribing this possibility at the heart of identity, it exposes it to about thinking it as such-or else thinks it only as a relative deficit against the return to the one (even when, in politics, it invokes La Boétie's Counter-One);20 thinkers of the return, who see in them a destruction or frustration of identity, this: that its meaning cannot be identical to it. We are our identity, and we all signification—a withdrawal that each signification indicates, at the limit. distribution of meaning into all significations and a withdrawal of meaning from ence is not the opposite of identity; for difference is what makes identity posbackground of ene humanity present-at-a-distance. This is to ignore that differin us and between us. Difference takes place in this sharing out, at once a "singularities" and our "community"—an identity that is necessarily shared out, designates—once again, in the simultaneous and undecidable reference to our All the modern problematics of difference attract the protestations of the

On Wonder

When the metaphysics of signification comes to know itself as its own limit, it exposes itself. It exposes itself to no longer being able to return to any signification, and to reopening the entire question of meaning, right up to the point, perhaps, of thinking and practicing signification itself in another way.

crisis, or into availability; and it lies also in this reality that is, after all, astonout any longer having meaning; it lies in that which throws language into representation, the accumulation of significations as much as their exhaustion projects; it lies in the distress or the hypocrisy of discourses that signify withmoments and of our death by the powers that be, by promises, values, or in being condemned to hunger or to helplessness; it lies in the theft of our lacking, and lost, that is, that we or meaning resists, and beyond all possible ishing: that we exist in such a worn and miserable state, that we exist destitute, its economic, technological, and political severity; it lies in poverty, in exploitation, meaning, without further ado, to signification. This demand lies in the condiour world. Once again, our existence demands its meaning and its rights. We once again to ourselves, and once again to one another, to our language and to tion that is imposed on us by our world, one that is often called "senseless" in distance, nor in general at a signification's distance. We must exist in the meaning can no longer allow ourselves to be presented at a Heaven's, Idea's, or History's able to understand or interpret ourselves—but also, that we are thereby exposed that we are. There is today an imperious, strident demand to stop surrendering This amounts to saying that we are exposed to the risk of no longer being

The meaning that resists is "open" meaning, the opening of meaning or the opening to meaning, that is, that which does not allow itself to be imprisoned in a signifying finality and enclosure. But meaning as opening does not open onto the void, any more than it infinitely tends toward its fulfillment. It opens directly onto us. It designates us as its element and as the place of its event or advent. But we are not a signification: neither a "humanity," nor a polis, nor a "project." We are the plural that does not multiply a singular—as if we were the collective figure of a sole reality (all the materialist critiques of idealism went no further than this)—but that, on the contrary, singularizes a common dispersion, this time irreducibly material and absolutely spiritual. We are the community of meaning, and this community has no signification; it does not subsume under a Meaning the exteriority of its parts, nor the succession of its moments, since, it is the element of meaning only insofar as it is exposed by and to this exteriority and succession.

This means very precisely that it is a community by not having a signification and because it has no signification. It is our exposure to meaning that constitutes our Being-in-common, and not the communication of significations. The idea of "communism" has represented in our history both the desire to fill this community with signification and our access to the bare moment when we have to think ourselves without signification: that moment when one must think the burgeoning and indigent enigma of the we as the very faint light where meaning itself rises.

vis the space of meaning-it is the spacing in which and as which there is open, or, if you will, the uncovered that puts us face to face. This uncovered meaning as thing; which also amounts to saying that we ourselves are "the open," and that the open is the thing, the real itself. What constitutes us is the indefinitely constitutes us. This manifestation is without secret because it is or with a combination of the three. But it is withdrawn from all these with the agency of the political or of passion (love and hate, terror and pity), meaning, a meaning that precedes all signification and that succeeds it too. without signification. But this is also why it is not the appearance of sometery. It is manifest. It is as manifest as the face-to-face or the between-us that "language," or "passion." There is only us, that is, the thing out in the open [a and difference. There is no such thing as the we, as there may be "the political," condition," or-if you want to use another parlance-the space, element, flesh, That space, that thing, we, might be identified with the agency of language, thing: it is itself the thing in itself. We are the thing-meaning's thing or this is neither dissimulated like a secret nor waiting to be revealed like a mysidentifications, of which it is, in old-fashioned parlance, the "transcendental découvert], being without subjectivity, finite man, and the unsignifiable provenance I seem to suppose something like a secret or a mystery: a self-evasion. Yet

Ever since its foundation, wonder has been philosophy's virtue. To wonder today is nothing other than to wonder before this resistance and insistence of our strange community in meaning, in the exposure to meaning. This certainly does not define "a philosophy"—that is, if "a philosophy" is still what is to be sought. But it does define the philosophical attitude and act (that are forgotten when one seeks to return to a signification of the world): to welcome the wonder before that which presents itself. Thought is this very welcoming. It does not give us meaning, but undergoes [éprouve] the demand for meaning, it tests us [nous éprouve]; it lets this demand speak and lets us speak. If "thinking" [penser] means "weighing" [peser], it is first of all in the sense of letting what weighs weigh, of feeling [éprouver] today the weight of the West reaching its destination, of letting it weigh with all the weight of its exhaustion and its venture of meaning.

our struggles—as soon as existence or the project itself opens itself [s'expose] to cation, and the sign-the index or signal-that signification is verging upon its limit, and that meaning is laid bare. happens or arrives at the limit. Wonder itself is a kind of sign without signifiitself as new. In the final analysis, wonder is nothing other than that which tion. One must always let the limit present itself anew, and it always presents one cannot hold on there as one could hold to a system or order of significano philosophical heroism in the tradition of the philosopher martyred for willingly or reluctantly—oscillating dangerously on its limit. No bravado here, significations, but has everything to do with what keeps signification-either and writing. This is what makes one feel the weight; it has nothing to do with cult, complex, and delicate set of decisions, acts, positions and gestures of thought undoing the subjugation to the distance of signification. The exhaustion and (= signifier of) truth. It is simply true; one cannot settle down on the limit, the recombination of—and the more or less uncertain commentary on— "philosophy." In no way is this a blissful contemplation, but, rather, a diffiremaining exposed, today, to the limit of "man," the "West," "history" and it-but in experiencing it as sovereign, and in remaining exposed to it, in not consist in mastering this sovereignty—that is, in signifying or representing the opening indicate that there is, here and now, a sovereign eternity of meaneach individual existence as for the scansions of history, for our projects and tion, a meaning to each of our existences—as much for the fleeting time of ing to our existence, meaning in withdrawal from, or in excess of, all significaing (in Rimbaud's sense). The work of thought, its discipline and its rigor, do The exhaustion and the opening indicate only one thing: that there is mean-

There will certainly be other significations, other tasks of signification, and other tasks than signification. But to discover them we must first make ourselves capable of wondering about this: that signification has had a history, that this history has been completed, that this completion is an event, and that we are already, whether we know it or not, whether we want it or not, engaged by meaning and in the meaning of what happens to us in this way.

. † 14

On Passivity

That it happens to us and that there is cause to wonder: this implies passivity. Passivity is not well regarded by the thoughts of signification, for signification is, by nature, an activity: it stamps meaning, prints it in intelligible characters, but it does not receive it (what does receive it—that infinitely malleable element of wax, that lawless and formless matter—philosophy has never been able to say).

but what runs up against or violates signification—the opening of meaning, or For such is indeed the definition of the real: it is not what is to be signified that is, it puts back into play, step by step, the entire order of significations once calls for and opens up the entire possibility and passibility of meaning in itself—happens (we happen). It happens constantly, and its happening at penetrate, no depth of the real that would await another signification or a be signified, and that is why language does not penetrate it; there is nothing to which are themselves only forms of signification. This outside does not have to cation. At this limit, language does not verge on the absurd or on nonsense a representation.) To inscribe is not to produce, nor is it to transcribe. One signification from beyond. But this outside—the real, the thing itself, the thing marks a reality that is heterogeneous to that order and does not then become might say that it is something like "to register": to enter into an order of is not a production. (Similarly, it is a "repetition" of meaning, and yet it is not The inscription is the gesture by which language passes to the limit of signifi makes it happen as such, or that it inscribes it. It is thus a "doing," and yet it ible to the event of meaning; it lets this event come—which means that it activity. It does not consist in being "passive," but in being, if we can put it nomogeneous to it. "Thinking" inscribes the limit of signification in language. Thought is not a discourse, but the disposition and the activity that are passthis way, passible to meaning, that is, capable of receiving or welcoming it. But the passivity that is at issue here cannot be determined in opposition to

(3)

The nakedness of meaning no doubt retains something of the traditional nakedness of Truth. However, signified truth presented (at a distance) a body that was desirable to the subject ("in truth," the imaged body of its own desire). The truth of meaning does not offer its nakedness as a body, nor, in general, as something. It presents itself much more as the very gesture of laying bare; to bare oneself is not to give something but is to offer this very gesture of baring oneself. What there is to be grasped of meaning, its truth, is not "something" (nor "all things"), but the fact that it offers its nakedness more than any naked identity. It offers the action of its "passivity"; it offers the very act of meaning: to make oneself passible to its event.

The hollow or crack disjoins the signifying order. The inscription is the outline of this disjunction. This outline has no recognizable profile, it has no face; it is neither "logical," nor "poetic," nor "philosophical," in the sense that these words are now exhausting their significations. Nor is it simply "practical." It is the quite singular outline of a passage to the limit, which is also, by definition, the limit of the outline or outlining. This is why the letter of the inscription is less signifying than transformational: transformations, variations, constant displacements of the passage itself. Because it passes in this way, the "passivity" of language or thought is an act; it forms an active power that requires strength, work, effort and rigor. But because it does not pass over the limit, since there is nothing to pass into, and since everything happens, on the contrary, on the limit, on this edge without an outside, which is nothing but the minuscule opening of meaning—because it only passes right at the limit, this power retains within itself all the passivity that consists in being passible to meaning.

This does not mean being capable of meaning, in the sense of inventing or fabricating new truths. (For truth is never new; it is always the same anew, identical to what comes to border on, overflow and disrupt signification.) Rather, it means being capable of receiving the shock of meaning. This capacity cannot be produced by way of significations. It cannot constitute what one would have formerly called a "message," nor what one commonly calls a "philosophy" (when in fact one has forgotten everything, or nearly so, about philosophy). This capacity—let us call it, despite everything, philosophy, since one needs a name, and since this one has a few credentials to claim for itself—must have preceded itself; one needs to have undergone the event and the upheaval of meaning in order to be passible to it. The use of the signifying system, the manipulation of discourse, must already, always-already, have been breached, tormented, and threatened by the limit of signification. This is why the original representation of philosophy—that is, as a 'loss' of meaning, or of meaning as such—should be understood in two ways: as the imaginary disappearance of a previous signification, or else, as the withdrawal of meaning by which meaning happens. In this sense, it is necessary that meaning abandon us so that we may be opened with the entire opening of meaning. And this, from now on, cannot be forgotten; this abandonment is what makes our history.

May 1986

Part Two

THE WEIGHT OF A THOUGHT

The Weight of a Thought

Etymology relates thinking [pensée] to weighing [pesée].

Pensare means to weigh, to appraise, to evaluate (and also to com-pensate, to counterbalance, to replace or exchange). It is an intensive form of pendo: to weigh up, to make or let the pans of a balance hang [pendre], to weigh, to appraise, to pay, and, in an intransitive mode, to hang, to be weighty. La pensée, thinking—the pens, the "pensing"—came later.

Etymological relations are of limited worth: their weight is only the rather light weight of the contingency of derivations (not to mention the uncertainty of conjectures concerning them, even if this is not the case here, or so it seems). Nonetheless, they have also a way of letting this suspicion—which we know to be more, much more, than just a suspicion—weigh, a suspicion according to which thinking occurs at the very level of languages, without us, without the thinking-subject-reeds who only come into the world, and to themselves, as carried and weighed by this thought.

Lightness and gravity, approximation and certainty, such is the poorly balanced condition of the thought of proper meaning, of the proper meaning of "thought," and of the proper provenance of meaning in general. Who could say what is proper to thinking and to weighing, to thinking as much as to weighing, thus being properly neither? Who can think how one counterbalances the other [se font pendant], or at what inclination [pente] one slides into the other? And why should "weighing," as a material act or state, be the proper and primary degree from which or on which "thought," as the second degree, as an immaterial act or state, would depend—a dependency that itself would entail some loss or expenditure [dépense] of meaning in the passage from one word to the other? Who could weigh, and on what scales, the "materiality" of weighing, on the one hand, and the "immateriality" of thought on the other? On what unit of weight, on what law of gravity [pesanteur], would such an operation be based?

Let us confess, instead, what everyone knows full well: thinking can never grasp weighing; it can offer a measure for it, but it cannot itself weigh up the weight. Nor can weighing touch thinking; it may indicate a few ounces of muscle and neuron, but it cannot register the infinite leap of which they would supposedly be the place, support, or inscription. (And what is a leap, if thought is indeed a leap? What sort of escape from gravity? What counterweight?) Against these obvious truths, the etymologist's desire would be to give us access, at least as a trace inscribed in language, to a weighty/weighing property of thought, which would be identical to a thinking property of the weighty

We certainly do experience the weight of thought. Sometimes the heaviness, sometimes the gravity of a "thought" ("idea," "image," "judgment," "volition," "representation," etc.) affects us with a perceptible pressure or inclination, a palpable curve—and even, with the impact of a fall (if only the falling of one's head into one's hands). But this experience remains a limit-experience, like any experience worthy of the name. It does take place, but not as the appropriation of what it represents; this is why I also have no access to the weight of thought, nor to the thought of weight.

This is not to say that the intimate co-appropriation of thinking and weighing is a mere figure of speech, or the fantasm of a somewhat alchemical materialism. On the contrary, this appropriation is certain and absolute. The act of thinking is an actual weighing; it is the very weighing of the world, of things, of the real as meaning.

There is no doubt that meaning is incorporated (if only as a "leap") into the reality of the real (into its matter, and thus into its weight)—just as there is no doubt that the real makes sense (it is an ideality, and therefore is without gravity). No skeptic's extravagant hypothesis could weaken this point; outside of this appropriation, there could be no existence. But there is existence, and the co-appropriation of meaning and the real is precisely that by which existence always precedes itself, as itself, that is to say, insofar as it is without essence—insofar as it is the without-essence.

This absolutely indubitable point of the reciprocal and archi-originary appropriation of weighing and thinking (which is truly the creation of the world) is equally, identically, the absolute point of inappropriability: we have no more access to the weight of meaning than (consequently) to the meaning of weight.

And it is not having such an access that makes us thinking as well as weighty beings, and that attunes within us, as ourselves, this dissonance of weight and thought that constitutes the whole weight of a thought.

(This does not mean that such an access would be available for other beings: the coappropriation of weighing and thinking, just as it is reached in etymology only through a metaphorical reversal [bascule] that always precedes itself, is in and of itself inaccessible, and definitively so; its terms define it in this way, just as they command it to occupy its inaccessible place.)

There is therefore no pure space or time. (General relativity curves both according to masses.) There are only places, which are simultaneously locations and extensions of bodies. Bodies are heavy. The weight of a localized body is the true purely sensible a priori condition of the activity of reason: a transcendental aesthetics of gravity [pesanteur].

In this transcendental aesthetics, the concept of an a priori "form" of sensibility becomes insufficient. Gravity is not simply a "form," for along with it "matter" is given, the very materiality of reason. Along with it is given this hard grain, this sharp point of dense ore that a thought pushes, presses heavily into the head and into the belly, throughout the whole body, with the force of a fall or a tearing. This weighing [pesée] organizes a priori the entire "logic" of a reason whose principle and end lie in the experience of this pressure [pesée] on the ground, loading it down to the point of hollowing it out, cracking it open, disarticulating its limbs and substances, casting it outside of itself.

But "outside of itself" is not another kind of "pure" system or order. Weighing (down) is not the pure outside-of-itself; rather, it is an exile, an errancy, a balancing oscillation from oneself to oneself. Thought weighs at the point where reason, being (present) to itself [ttant à soi], distances itself from itself and does so with the whole distance of this to. Now this distance, the distance of the presence-to-itself of an existence whose existing means precisely this presence-to—a to of being (presence) itself, the to of a sending, of a sending back, of a throw, a projection, a rejection, the to of a yet-to-come, of an expectation, an attention, a call—this distance is nothing other than meaning, absolutely.

Thought weighs exactly the weight of meaning. It is the weight of an extremity on which an irresistible force is being applied at the place of a possible eruption of meaning (that is to say, in every place), causing at once shattering and compaction, concentration and explosion, pain and joy, meaning and absencing of meaning.

With this absolute tip, which is the first and last property of a thought—angle, spike, stylus, signature—we are repeatedly taught that there is no sense in trying to totalize meaning (even if by a minor or temporary totalization), in trying to adjust to a completed knowledge the event of an existence that, precisely, exists only in the disjunction of the presence-to, in unconnected tremors, and in the halting quality of its events. Meaning is an event, not an ending [finition]. Or, rather: its ending is itself endless [sans fin].

The place, the weighty and pointed hic et nunc, cannot be dislodged or delocalized into an ether of "full meaning" (of meaningful meaning...). But the place constitutes meaning in remaining the place, at once weighty and pointed—pressed upon and pierced through. Meaning always has the sense of the noncompleted, the nonfinished, of the yet-to-come, and in general of the 10.

Meaning does not have the sense of an answer, and not even of a question; in this sense, it has no meaning. But it is the event of an opening. It brings no salvation, but greets (calls) the to-come and the end-less. It does not gather community or bring about intimacy, but relentlessly exposes a common exteriority, a spacing, a coappearance of strangers. (This is why there is no primary or final place, no capital, no Rome, Athens, Mecca, or Jerusalem. There is only the gap between places, which constitutes place, and the weight of each place, of each landing or meeting place.)

The weight of a thought—its local, pointed, stretched, multiple, disappropriated open weight—is what is also called, in another vocabulary, finitude.

Finitude is not the privation of the infinite, in the sense that the infinite itself would be the appropriation and the total resorption of meaning as relation-to-itself: the appropriation and resorption of the 10, of the gap and of the 10, of the not-yet and the yet-to-come, the appropriation and reduction of the opening "to," of the coming of the other, in itself, as "self," to the self, the appropriation and absorption of birth and death, and existence finally transfigured into a pure essence. This—this Hegelian "good infinite"—would indeed presuppose the negation of its own negation (the negation of the limit, of the gap, of alterity, and of the open), that is, the negation of finiteness in its traditional sense. According to this concept of finiteness, the essence and destination of the finite consist in this self-negation: lack and relativity are by definition subsumed under the realization in plenitude and absoluteness, under an endless ending.

But the modern sense of finitude—that is, our sense of finitude, the one that is to be made ours, to be appropriated, and thus, that is yet to come—forms, on the contrary, the absoluteness of the finite. The finite no longer constitutes the negation of the infinite, which the infinite would have to negate. It constitutes, rather, a mode of ending (of completion of meaning) that does not conficulty, that does not complete or totalize and, in this exact sense, does not "infinitize."

It is that which lies in the availability of the singular, of the nontotalizable, the uncompleted, the open, or of the granular, fractal, or dispersed totalities, and in the necessity of contingency, in the harshness of errancy, and, finally, in the exposure of that Being-exposed that we call "existence." In the end, it is still existence that is at issue.

In finitude, therefore, a thought does not complete the meaning (of what) it thinks, and thus lets this "object"—the thing itself—have the weight that carries it away from completed, presentified, or signified meaning. The weight of thought is then the weight of the thing insofar as that thing weighs outside of thought, insofar as it punctures and overflows the thought that it is, but that it can be only by being open to the thing, and to its heaviness. The "opening" does not carry here those dubious values of dynamism and generosity that are attributed to it by a weak modern convention. Being-open is nothing other than Being-finite, and the "open"—just like the closure of the finite—is nothing other than the to, the heaviness of the to by which meaning, in order to be meaning, exceeds and exceeds itself.

The watchword of all modern thought is: "to the things themselves!" But in this "to" one must discern all the heaviness, the whole heavy fall of thought that is necessary in order to make that which exceeds meaning weigh in meaning, that which opens meaning to the thing to which it is a matter of giving its meaning, or, in truth, of letting its meaning be given or delivered: that which constitutes meaning by exceeding all meaning. The existence of the slightest pebble already overflows; however light it may be, it already weighs this excessive weight.

Certain habits that some claim to be "Cartesian" (this is, in fact, mere ideological senility) lead one to believe that ideas must be "clear," it being understood that "clarity" is something of the order of pure transparency, perhaps even of the void. But who wants an empty thought?

Meaning needs a thickness, a density, a mass, and thus an opacity, a darkness by means of which it leaves itself open and lets itself be touched as meaning right there where it becomes absent as discourse. Now, this "there" is a material point, a weighty point: the flesh of a lip, the point of a pen or of a stylus, any writing insofar as it traces out the interior and exterior edges of language. It is the point where all writing is ex-scribed, where it comes to rest outside of the meaning it inscribes, in the things whose inscription this meaning is supposed to form. This ex-scription is the ultimate truth of inscription. Made absent as discourse, meaning comes into presence within this absence, meaning that has consistency and resistance? For it is the communication of not let itself be breached? Who would not want an impenetrable meaning, a like a becoming heavy or weighty, a sudden, destabilizing weight of thought. like a concretion, a thickening, an ossification, an induration of meaning itself; munication represents the noncommunication of a "meaning" (the nondelivery this resistance that makes me "endowed with meaning"—even when this com-Who would not want a thought that blocks all passage through it, that does of meaning rather than the meaning of existence. singular existent, at the very level of the "open" of that existent, and insofar as this meaning does not subsume existence under an essence. It is the existence this meaning itself actually exists, insofar as it is given at the very level of the "Finitude" designates nothing other than the meaning of existence insofar as only for a day. Rather than repeating the proverb that says "As soon as a child assigned, determined or stated in the language of significations. But meaning absolute of meaning. soon as an existence comes into the world, it bears the whole of meaning, the is born, it is old enough to die," it would be better to give its true meaning: as meaning (there is meaning as such) even in the existence of a child who lives signifiance of Being) by and in the very fact that it exists. This is why there is does exist, or again: existence is itself meaning, it is the absolute signifiance (the Existence does not have a meaning, in the sense of a property that could be existence denies that it has meaning as a property, since it is meaning. It thereing—as the entirety of meaning, absolutely. But, at the same time, in existing, appropriation of the inappropriable. fore has to appropriate the inappropriability of the meaning that it is. This is the Being-in-debt or even the Being-guilty of the existent. Existence is the what, in other, somewhat unfortunate terms, has been called the Being-in-lack, In existing, existence presupposes itself and calls itself infinitely as mean-the impropriety of the proper (proper to the proper itself, absolutely). The weight of a thought is exactly this inappropriability of appropriation, or magazines or on television of our world as a "finite" world, of our history as a "finite" history. One understands by this that humanity seems to touch on, to Nowadays, the vocabulary of finitude is commonly used. One speaks in > to the humble certainty (with as little bitterness as possible) of being bound to the limited area of our little circumscribed space where no Ending can ever assured of its Ending. Now, on the contrary, one would have to resign oneself knowledge, and power: in both cases, albeit in different ways, Meaning was the "infinite universe" of an exponential expansion of humanity, of its history, space of a world "closed" around its landmarks and in its order, we moved to itself under the constraints of these limits. From the ancient and pre-Western come up against, some limits, and so now has to conceive of itself and manage sense of missed or truncated signification. nately remains the name of the non-infinite, that is, of the badly-finished and makes the whole vocabulary of finitude fragile and suspect: the finite obstipleteness, a thought of lack, of relativity and weakness. This is, in fact, what tarian threat. But it remains precisely a thought of the negativity of incomwith the idea that any completeness of meaning harbors a dogmatic and totali-This thought claims to be "positive," it wants to approve of this human, all too human condition, it wants to assume it, and it comforts itself above all the nor-finished in the sense of the incomplete, the aborted, the failed, in the scription itself. Of having weight at the heart of and in spite of thought: of being the breast, the belly, the guts of thought. A burden of meaning in excess ex-scription be the Being-inscribed, or rather the true Being-inscribing of initself in the order of meaning. Of ex-scribing this inscription—such that the in its appropriation. Of being both eventful and disruptive even as it inscribes on the condition of remaining inappropriable, and of remaining inappropriated thought catches sight of, weighs up, as the most proper meaning, but proper staves in [defonce] the ground. Letting existence resist—that is, endeavoring to hurling things deeper, and scattering them further than any bottom of things. let it, working toward a letting, toward a letting-fall and a letting-weigh that Hurling them into existence, from the height of existence itself, in a fall that incompletion, the weight of what unsolders and unseals the bottom [fond], This thought thus misses its own weight: the weight of what is completed in tion, "a dreadful black sun from which the night shines," but a sun all the abyss. The abyss is only a version of the infinite in its negation of finite negatience, and the letting-come of existence-all this does not collapse into an appropriability, this reversal, this staving in—tears and joy, trembling, impa-The weight of meaning, its excess with respect to all "meaningful"

same. It is a question here of a meaning that neither dominates nor shines down like a sun, that does not rise to the zenith, or set to the nadir, but that plurally, absolutely, as impossible to resorb as to complete. existing here-and-now, in a singular here-and-now, and always singular anew weighs insofar as it alights and sinks in [s'enfonce], and even settles, each time it, that the figure reproduces. "figuration" that "represents" something, that is, that stands for something other are speaking of-or wished to speak of-does not take place in the order of a ures, or in a figurability that is at once general and fragmented. But what they texts. All these texts speak of the appropriation of the inappropriable in figfigure). It is this figuration that we would like to address here and in other there are existences (but not according to the solar, circular, sacrificial ultrathan the figure itself, and for "something other," or some essential feature of This means that inappropriable meaning presents itself in as many figures as definitely heavier or lighter than anything one might grasp of it. it leaves it inappropriable, fragmentary, fractured, a fractal object of meaning exhausts itself in showing what these demonstrative pronouns show, and yet tograph, with this pose-with this weight, with this thought; but this image is, as this configuration and this event. It counts as this someone in this phonor as his portrait, made in his image. Instead, it counts as the image that it image does not count as the representative of the real person photographed, this book to be entirely a picture book)—a photograph of someone. This One will find here-it is an example and more than an example (I would like itself, it presents the absentification that happens in the coming of presence. insofar as it appropriates itself. The inappropriable is not represented: it presents No. It is here a question of the figures that inappropriable meaning forms of a presence in the endless process of coming. a writing, a gesture, in order to stress or let weigh the heavy or light features What we are attempting to grasp in the term figure would be an exposition (or the sketching of an art) of the inappropriable gravity of meaning. An image, same time heavy and light. Are we (we who keep saying to ourselves that we weigh, just as it comes, just as it passes away, heavy or light, and always at the going to let ourselves simply exist? sented with this constantly renewed gravity? Are we-with difficulty and serenityarrive so late, so much at the end), in the end, going to let ourselves be prenot of "thinking" meaning (of elaborating its signification) but of letting it On this account, a figure would be the entire weight of a thought: its way, > its thickness, its density, its extended thing, its halting, disjointed time, its is just as much attached to the body... undiscipline, its stammering, its visceral unconsciousness, and its lucidity, which The simplicity of existence: its turbulence, its turmoil, its sorrow and its joy, bodies, things, fragments of meaning are-that we are. meaning. It gives way to the weighing of these countless figures that places This is the limit of an era, which was the era of the representation of a unveiling of truth. In this sense, History is indeed finished, or finite, and "finitude", opens another history. tainly not. We have exhausted the schemas of progress and of the progressive We will not go so far as to say that we have "finally" found meaning. Cer-

to the breakthroughs of "spirit." The psyche is first psyche by its extension. to this exteriority-in-itself, or with respect to the to-itself that constitutes it. partes extra partes, and by the opacity to itself in which it remains with respect woven into the opacity of meaning, into its consistency and into its resistance will see, however, that this is not an antihistorical proposition): they are always We will say instead that the conditions of meaning are always the same (we meaning, are a part, and not the smallest, of its opacity and resistance. tion itself, this twisting and incessant multiplication of figures, of exposures of "Greek" into "Arab" and from "Arab" into "Christian"—and this transformaits figures transform themselves, for example from "Jew" into "Greek" and from enslavements of intelligence, its opaque apodicticity. But—and this is history always made itself known by its obstinate consistence, its resistance to the of luminous certainties. Nor did a Plato or a Descartes. On the contrary, meaning or a Buddhist, accede to the kingdom of meaning in a procession or ascension was also their opacity. Never did a Christian, a Greek, a Jew, a Nambikwara, this "transparency" is only the interpretation that we offer to ourselves of what to have been immersed in the transparency of meaning (the Christian, Greek, Jewish, Nambikwara, or Zen world, etc.), we must above all understand that what access to meaning was had by the inhabitants of a world that seems to us The conditions of meaning are always the same, and if we want to imagine ("The psyche is extended, and does not know it": this is Freud's great saying.)

ing of the exposed identity of meaning, and the dispersion of its "meaning." meaning—as are the figure-moments of the Hegelian process: they are the shatter-This is also why these figures are not successive figurations of the same identical which all identifiable figures have become inconsistent (the gods, the logoi, the Our time is the time that, as it were, exposes exposure itself: the time for billion bodies in an ecotechnical whirlwind that no longer has any other end to) the coming of a figure of the unidentifiable, the figures of opacity and of wise, knowledge), and which therefore works toward (or which gives itself over than the infinity of an inappropriable meaning. thick and heavy with the weight of an excessive thought of its humanity: eight resistant consistency as such. "Man" thus becomes opaque to himself, he grows creation of a world saints, and it is rather a formidable density of common destiny that is brought it. We need a thought that would be like a mass out of true, the fall and the bottom rather than extracting themselves from it. That stave it in and expose it is an "art"—of thickness, of gravity. We need figures that weigh upon the which is the meaning of all and of each (and of no one). We need an art—if come from a measure, but from the incommensurable opacity of meaning, to light, to our light, the entire weight of a community of equals that does not us, if "art" signifies a privileging of chosen, sublated, sublime, exquisite figures. absencing of the ending [finition]—there will not be only one. By right, any exposes us to this density? With what figure? By de-finition-that is, by the For meaning has, on the contrary, no chosen or privileged ones, no heroes or figure is already such an exposure. This is why "art" can no longer suffice for How are we to let it be seen that meaning exposes itself as impenetrable, and

TRANSLATORS' PREFACE

- 1. For instance: The Literary Absolute, trans. Philip Barnard and Cheryl Lester (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1988); their work on Lacan, The Title of the New York, 1992); or the more recent "The Nazi Myth," trans. B. Holmes, Critical Inquiry 16, no. 2 (Winter 1990): 291-312. Letter, trans. François Raffoul and David Pettigrew (Albany: State University of
- 2. They cover a broad and impressive range of topics and themes, touching on issue cited as PF, and The Birth to Presence (Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, bibliography of Jean-Luc Nancy's work, see Paragraph, 16, no. 2 (June 1993). dom and finitude (The Experience of Freedom [Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1993], hereafter cited as EF); Une Pensée Finie [Paris: Galilée, 1990], hereafter of interpretation ("Sharing Voices," in Transforming the Hermeneutic Context [Albany; hereafter cited as SM) and Etre singulier pluriel (Paris: Galilée, 1996). For a good hereafter cited as IC); of the political (La comparation [Politique à venir], with State University of New York Press, 1990], hereafter cited as SV); of community 1993) hereafter cited as BP. Also recently: Le sens du monde ([Paris: Galilée, 1994] Christophe Bailly (Paris: Christian Bourgois, 1991), hereafter cited as C); of free-(The Inoperative Community [Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1991].
- For this, one might read Christopher Finsk's excellent introduction to The Inop. erative Community, as well as Paragraph 16, no. 2 (June 1993).
- "Philosophy is that which thinks the present reality (the only one there is . . .) by cited as Gravity. thinking the present, the presence and presentation of reality." Jean-Luc Nancy, The Gravity of Thought 15. Hereafter references to the present volume will be
- 5. Luc Ferry and Alain Renaut, French Philosophy of the Sixties, trans. Mary Schnackenberg Cattani (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1990).
- 6. What Habermas characterized as the attempt to "hold on to the intentions of the Enlightenment." In "Modernity versus Postmodernity," New German Critique, 22
- For example: François Laruelle, Les philosophies de la différence (Paris: PUF, 1986)
- The theme of a "policing" of thought can already be found explicitly in Immanuel entitled La police de la pensée, which was aimed at Ferry and Renaut's essay. ably refer to an article published by Jean-François Lyotard and Jacob Rogozinsky, as a "discipline of Reason." In this discussion, however, Nancy's remarks presum-Press 1965), Bxxv, p. 27, in the context of a definition of the Critique of Pure Reason Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, trans. Norman Kemp Smith (New York: St. Martin's

- 9. Nancy opposes to a system of signification, which represents meaning's closure upon itself, the opening and excess of meaning to which the closure of significations exposes us. More generally, meaning is said to be the element or the possibility for Fata Morgana, 1972). In a footnote in SM (21-22 n. 1) Nancy returns to and "Meaning and signification," in Humanisme de l'autre homme (Montpellier, France: Nancy's work can be traced back to Emmanuel Lévinas, in particular to his essay cept of signifiance, which points toward the condition of possibility of significations. clarifies this distinction. in the coming of a possible signification" (Gravity, 10). This crucial distinction in He writes, "Signification is located meaning, while meaning resides perhaps only the production of significations, and is therefore a notion that is close to the con-
- 10. Nancy writes, for instance, "Christianity and empiricism have led us to ourselves, man rights, art for art's sake, and the total man, etc. have" (Gravity, 48). they have destined us, just as democracy, axiomatics, the critique of reason, hu-
- 11. In Poetry, Language, Thought, trans. Albert Hofstadter (New York: Harper & Row
- 12. On this question, we refer the reader to Dominique Janicaud and François Mattéi's text, La métaphysique à la limite (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1983).
- 13. In The Community at Loose Ends (Albany: State University of New York Press), 5 Hereafter cited as CLE.
- 14. On this "to," see Gravity, 77.
- For instance: Plato, Theatetus, English trans., F. M. Cornford, in The Collected University Press, 1961), p. 860 and Aristotle, Metaphysics, English trans. Richard Hope (Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, 1960), p. 7. Dialogues of Plato, eds. Edith Hamilton and Huntington Cairns (Princeton: Princeton
- 16. Among others, let us single out these passages: "The wonder before the fact that it happens bears the name and form of the philosophical for the West" (Gravity, 10) when one seeks to return to a signification of the world): to welcome the wonder sought. But it does define the philosophical attitude and act (that are forgotten tainly does not define 'a philosophy'—that is, if 'a philosophy' is still what is to be or "Ever since its foundation, wonder has been philosophy's virtue.... This cerbefore that which presents itself. Thought is this very welcoming" (Gravity, 67).
- 17. In what follows and in our translation of Nancy, we will risk here the neologisms, "passibility," and "to be passible to," because of their proximity to "passivity" and
- For instance, IC, 98.
- In PF, 14-16, Nancy develops the notion of a kind of self-reflexivity (without appropriation) of meaning by which the opening of meaning is at once an opening-to-self.
- On this point, see Gravity, xxvi.
- For a discussion of this judicial sense, see C, 50 ff.
- Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, Bxxvii, p. 27.
- "Being is in no way different from existence, which is singular each time" (CLE, 1).
- Martin Heidegger, Being and Time, trans. John Macquarrie and Edward Robinson (New York: Harper & Row, 1962), 60/36. Hereafter cited as BT, with English
- 25 pagination preceding German. CLE, 1. Also, a few pages later, Nancy states: "There is no common being, but there is being in common" (CLE, 4). On this point, see EF, 69-70.

- 26. For instance, in the essay "Of Being-in-Common" (CLE, 2), he explains that as it should be" (emphasis added); also in IC, 3, 14, and in a more critical mode, Heidegger's Mitsein, or Mit-da-sein, "is not thought out as radically or as decisively
- 27. As he explains, "Immanence, if it were to come about, would instantly suppress community, or communication, as such" (IC, 12).
- 28. In paragraph 26 of Being and Time, Heidegger similarly rejected the conception of juxtaposition of singular items that could be reckoned with or counted as numerals. 163/125), that is, rejected the "categorial" understanding of others in terms of a Being-with as the "summative result of the occurrence of several subjects" (BT,
- 29. A term that already appears in Nancy's L'impératif catégorique (Paris: Flammarion, 1983), 59, in the context of a discussion of origin, of its withdrawal and "nonsimplicity."
- IC, 14 (emphasis added). "Death," he also explains, is "indissociable from community, for it is through death that the community reveals itself" (IC, 14).
- 31. But precisely by counting Being-with as an existentiale, Heidegger had already which we have now completed, Being with Others belongs to the Being of Dasein, which is an issue for Dasein in its very Being. Thus as Being-with, Dasein is essentially for the sake of others. This must be understood as an existential staterendered this opposition untenable. He writes, for instance, "According to the analysis ment as to its essence" (BT, 160/123).
- "The community resists: in a sense, as I have said, it is resistance itself" IC, 58.
- term, as well as a list of works that have contributed to this "thought of partage." In a long footnote in C (55-56 n. 2), Nancy gives a "history" of his use of the
- 34. C, 54-55. In "De l'être-en-commun" (a passage from the original text that is not repartition, dialogue, dialectic, difference of the identical." In La communauté désoeuvrée, 2d ed. (Paris: Christian Bourgois, 1990), 211. available in English), Nancy offers the following senses of partage: "partition and
- 35. For a discussion of this term, see William McNeill's explanatory note in his transand Time," in Research in Phenomenology 15 (1985): 193-226 (and now in The ford: Blackwell, 1992), 24-25 n. 8. Also: Theodore Kisiel, "On the Way to Being California Press, 1993]). Genesis of Heidegger's Being and Time [Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of lation of Heidegger's 1924 lecture Der Begriff der Zeit, The Concept of Time (Ox-
- 36. Aristotle, The Physics, English trans. R. P. Hardie and R. K. Gaye, in The Basic Works of Aristotle, ed., Richard McKeon (New York: Random House, 1941),
- For instance, in EF, 72-73.
- "The pronoun 'we' manifests such an undecidable: 'We': first-person plural: let us in-Common" (CLE, 6; trans. modified). try to imagine the difficulty of this simple designation," writes Nancy in "Of Being-
- 39. On this point, see Nancy's introduction to Who Comes After the Subject? (New York: Routledge, 1991), 8. Hereafter cited as WCAS.
- 40. In Le sens du monde, Nancy formulates the question of the "singular" being-the quelconque), and the exposed. SM, 111-21. some one —in terms of the three thematics of the unique, the whatever (le
- 41. Basic Problems of Phenomenology, trans. Albert Hofstadter (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1982), 288/408

43. Nancy seeks to complicate Heidegger's famous distinction between the facticity (Faktizität) of existence and the factuality (Tatsächlichkeit) of things that are simply "present-at-hand." On this question, see "The Decision of Existence," in BP, 82–109; EF, 157–58; and SM, 94 ff.

44. Le Temps et l'autre (Paris: PUF, Editions Quadrige, 1983), 37.

45. This sense of finitude can be understood against the background of Heidegger's re-interpretation of finitude, for instance in the lecture "On Time and Being," where finitude was rethought in relation to the event of appropriation, Ereignis, and no longer in reference to the infinite. We read for example, "The finitude of approand Being," in On Time and Being (New York: Harper and Row, 1972), 54. terms of the concept of one's own." "Summary of a Seminar on the Lecture 'Time finitude is thought in this manner—that is, in terms of Appropriation itself, in rather as finitude in itself: finitude, end, limit, one's own. . . . The new concept of priation, of Being . . . is no longer thought in terms of the relation to infinity, but

On this "concept," see "Exscription," in BP, in particular, pp. 337-39.

GRAVITY

(The following are all notes from the translators.)

1. Lourd, in French, also has the sense of something difficult, hard to bear. In the passage that follows, the reader should hear both senses.

Literally, "heavy with consequences." This means that which has many serious

3. Literally, "it falls under meaning," and has the sense of that which is obvious. consequences.

PART ONE THE FORGETTING OF PHILOSOPHY

- 1. Sens-Nancy plays often on the different senses of this term: "meaning," "sense," cases and will serve to translate no other words unless indicated. "direction," and "perceptual faculty." "Meaning" and "sense" will suffice in most
- 2. Nancy plays here on the polysemy of the word ouverture, which usually signifies expression ouverture d'esprit. On this distinction, see PF, 16-17. "opening" but is also used in the moral sense of being "open-minded," as in the

3. L'à venir, literally, "what is yet to come," is also a homonym of l'avenir, "the future.

4. Solon: Athenian archon whose name is associated with a particularly legalistic style of administration.

The Philosophy of Right, trans. with notes by T. M. Knox (London: Oxford University Press, 1967), 11.

6. Finie: in both senses of the term, that is, either a philosophy that has reached its "end" (fin), is "finished," or is finite.

A même—on this expression, see the translator's preface.

- 8. Même is usually just an intensifier. Le soi-même, though it could be translated literally as something like "the self itself," has come to designate simply "the self." "same." However, Nancy here seems to be calling attention to the literal meaning of même—
- 9. Even though, in ordinary German usage, the term Handgriff means a "manipulahand. We have therefore not resorted to Smith's rendering as "modes of activity" tion" and has been rendered in the various French translations of the Critique of and have followed Nancy's retranslation. literal translation of it (coup de main), one that would preserve the reference to the Pure Reason as either mécanisme, or fonctionnement, Nancy here attempts a more
- 10. Nancy refers here to the untranslatable neologism coined by Jacques Lacan (in in order to render the Deutung of Bedeutung (signification). On this point, we "The Agency of the Letter in the Unconscious or Reason since Freud," in Ecrits) refer the reader to Nancy and Lacoue-Labarthe's Title of the Letter, 61–78.

11. On the concept of "touch" in Nancy's work, see Jacques Derrida, "Le Toucher (Touch/to touch him)," in Paragraph, 122–57.

- 12. In the passage that follows, Nancy draws upon the double meaning of the word expérience (experiment/experience), which we have rendered accordingly as the context
- 13. An expression which Nancy borrows from Thomas Mann, as he reminds us in a footnote to his essay "Myth Interrupted," in The Inoperative Community, 160 n. 6.

14. "Représentation/conception/vision du monde" all mean "worldview." Nancy plays on these different forms in the passages that follow.

15. "The West at Its Ends": L'Occident arrivé à ses fins. There is a play on words in the title of this chapter; the idiom arriver à ses fins means "to get what one wants," Nancy plays on the double sense of arriver. both "to arrive" and "to happen. though it literally means "to reach or arrive at one's ends." Throughout this chapter,

In English in the original.

In English in the original.

18. Nancy plays here on the verb vouloir, which is generally used in the sense of "to want" but which, when substantified as le vouloir, signifies "will."

- 19. Untranslatable play on "same" (Gravity, pp. 23; 89, note 8) and "other." Nous autres (literally, we others) ordinarily designates an "us" that has the more inclusive sense of "all of us," as in nous autres artistes (we artists). Yet Nancy is here emphasizing the fact that this "we" exists only as exposed and is therefore in some sense "other." For instance, Nancy writes in "Finite History": "The otherness of existence consists in its non-presence to itself, which comes from its birth and death. We are others—each one for the other and each for him/herself." In BP,
- 20. This expression is borrowed from the full title of La Boëtie's (1530-1563) celebrated critique of tyranny as the rule of the one, De La Servitude Volontaire ou Contr'un (Geneva: Droz, 1987), translated as Slaves by Choice (Egham Hill: Runnymede, 1988).

PART TWO THE WEIGHT OF A THOUGHT

1. The book from which this essay is drawn (Le poids d'une pensée [Sainte-Foy, Québec: Le Griffon d'argile, 1991], 113–24) contains a series of photographs (not reproduced here) depicting someone named Georges with captions by Nancy.

Index

Benjamin, Walter, 18, 33, 47, 54, 55, 59

Bergson, Henri, 18, 47 Braudel, Fernand, 28

communism, 66 community, 9, 14, 20, 24, 35, 41, 44, 61, 64, 66, 78, 84 crisis, 13–15, 17–19, 21–22, 28–30, 35, 40–41, 44, 53–54, 65

Descartes, René, 14, 21, 31, 34, 51–52, 61, 83 desire, 31–35, 39–41, 48–49, 55, 66, 70

Feuerbach, Ludwig, 53

Enlightenment, 1, 14

finitude, 78-81 Freud, Sigmund, 18-19, 47, 83

Hegel, G. W. F., 43–44, 49, 52, 78, 83 Heidegger, Martin, 18–19, 33, 39, 47, 54–55, 59, 61

hermeneutics, 58-59 history, 13, 15, 17, 21, 44, 60, 67, 83 humanism, 19-20, 23, 24-25, 27, 34, 49, 58, 61-62

Husserl, Edmund, 18, 24, 33, 40, 47

Idea (regulative), 14, 21, 24, 32, 35, 42, 49 ideology, 20, 22, 37

Kant, Immanuel, 14, 17-18, 21-24, 30, 32, 35, 41, 43, 48-49, 51-52, 61 Kierkegaard, Søren, 18, 47

Leibniz, G. W., 13, 18

Marx, Karl, 18–19, 33, 40, 47, 52, 54, 61

meaning, 3, 9–10, 19, 24, 33, 37, 41, 43, 49, 51, 57, 65–66, 79–80; conditions of, 83; desire for, 31; displacement of, 30; as distinct from signification, 10, 22–23, 44, 48, 62–63; elementarity of, 60; event of, 69, 78; "full," 78; inappropriable, 82; loss of, 28–29, 75; opening of, 65–67; as possibility of signification, 59–60; presence-at-adistance of, 35, 40, 54, 69–70; proper, 75; and the real, 76; weight of, 76–77, 81 metaphysics, 39, 41, 43, 47, 51; of

Nietzsche, Friedrich, 17–19, 21, 33, 39–40, 44, 47, 54, 58 nihilism, 44, 48, 54

myth, 28, 53

Montaigne, Michel de, 24, 27, 31, 33

representation, 40

passivity, 69–70
Plato, 22, 29, 39, 43–44, 49, 51–52, 58, 60, 83 philosophy, 10, 14–15, 17–18, 20–24, 27, 32–33, 35, 37–39, 41, 52, 54, 56, 59, 66–67, 69–70; forgetting of, 1, 7, 15, 24, 40; and metaphysics, 43–44, 47, 49, 51, 55 progress, 21, 28; thought of, 27; schema of, 83

project, 62-65; and lack, 33; of meaning, 62; of presentation, 23; of signification, 24, 27, 37-40, 55; of the subject, 31

reason, 14, 17, 20–23, 32, 40, 48–49, 77; fact of, 60 return, 1–3, 10–11, 13–15, 17–19, 25, 27–30, 35, 38, 40–41, 44–45, 49, 52, 54, 56, 59, 62–65, 67; return to, 20–22, 24 Rousseau, Jean-Jacques, 18, 27, 31, 35

signifiance, 23, 57, 60, 80 signification, 10, 19-20, 22-23, 25, 28-32, 34-38, 47, 54-56, 62-63, 69, 80-82; and community, 66; exhaustion of, 43-45, 48, 52, 56, 59; and interpretation, 58-60; limit of, 24, 33, 48, 51-53, 57-58, 61, 69-70; metaphysics of, 65; order of, 31, 58, 61, 67; of philosophy, 38-40; principle of, 41; project of, 27; structure of, 40-41

singularity, 54, 62, 64-66, 79-80, 82 Spinoza, Baruch, 18, 33, 52 subject, 2, 10, 19, 22-25, 28-29, 31-35, 40, 43, 49; of desire, 32; division of, 33; of representation, 40; of signification, 24, 43, 49; truth of, 34; value of, 35

truth, 7, 9, 33–35, 44, 53–55, 57–59, 67, 70

value, 19, 21, 29, 32–35, 38, 39, 42, 44, 53, 56, 58, 63, 65, 79; philosophy of, 38; as willed signification, 25

weight, 1-3, 75-79, 82; and the inappropriable, 80-81; of thought, 1, 3, 75-76, 80, 82, 84; as unit of measure, 75; of the West, 67 West, the, 9-10, 21, 27-28, 32, 38, 47-49, 51-52, 54, 58, 62, 67 Wittgenstein, Ludwig, 18, 19, 33, 47, 54, 55, 59 wonder, 65-67