Have you ever wondered how to avoid hard exams, work, unbearable relatives, teachers or even children?

Lately, the obvious solution would be to get infected by the new plague – the coronavirus.

There could be a better solution: pills that would convince everyone that you have the illness. It may be immoral to fake such a deadly disease, yet very convenient for everyone who needs a bit of time by themselves. Such an invention would contain substances, which would react positively with corona virus tests – an artificial antigen, which an infected body would normally produce.

The great part of it all would be that you would not have to travel to China or Italy to contract the real thing, nor would you have to bear any potentially deadly symptoms. Users of this ingenious invention would be ill only in the laboratory test results, without feeling unwell. Not only would this invention be useful for attention seekers (especially influencers, bloggers and journalists, who could use it to infiltrate the quarantines and hopefully live through to tell the tale later), but introverts could also use it as a pretext to avoid company of other people.

In conclusion, all users would be free to enjoy the pampering by the medical system and plenty free time. Such a product would allow you to finish your favourite TV series, computer game or book whilst there would be no suspicion that you are lazy or trying to avoid people.
