Breaking invention

better
"you reach"
a speed.

Remember those indescribably exciting years, when ordinary cars started ^{reaching} going up to the 100 kilometres per hour? When you didn't have to waste hours on the road anymore? Surely, you do not. But I believe you can imagine that leap of efficiency just by reducing transport time by car invention. But what if knowledge of quantum entanglement ^{was reduced} got that high, ^{the invention of the car.} So that even controlled immediate transmission of information was possible? What if a teleport was invented?

what? noun
"until the discovery of"

The idea is quite old; however, until ^{the discovery of} discovering of peculiar connection between two quantum systems, no one had any notion how to realize it. Nowadays, the idea is not to transport the matter, but only the information about the quantum state of the body to the ^{wanted} destination. However simple ^{the} does it sound, technical realisation is far beyond our present possibilities.

better:
"reached that level"

"matter" (non-count)
(in general)

better:
"desired"

Anyway, most of the people would doubt whether that sort of invention is necessary and some will probably mark it as the threat for mankind. For this kind of criticism, we can argue ^{with} that vast number of families, which are broken up because of the distance. Those, who seek for the more pragmatic reason, ^{is} thirty of world carbon dioxide production is caused by transportation. And what more, even electricity transport would cost less while reducing ^{is} losses etc. etc.

"we argue that..."

Imagination is immense, but the reality is never that bright and twice ^{so} in this case. Even the most optimistic predictions say such ^{on} invention is centuries far.

Phrase: "what is more"

- opening IP good rhetorical device!

- good development of idea

- problems mostly with language: wrong incorrect phrases.
misused verbs.
