

sorry, this is
OK~~later~~

It turned apparent that Nick had a rather hazy memory of ~~yesterday's~~ night out with his teammates. All he could recollect was that it started ~~so~~ <sup>so</sup> innocently as a dinner at their favourite burger restaurant near the training facility. It had been an established tradition that all players and coaching staff gathered there ~~the~~ <sup>each</sup> first Friday evening of a month and savoured the delicate blue-cheese and pulled-pork burgers that had made the restaurant a well-known venue in the city. Despite the self-discipline and pretty strict diet, Nick and a couple of other younger players ordered several rounds of beer, since the season had already finished, so there was no obligation to be in top shape in the following morning. As some of the younger players became considerably tipsy, someone suggested taking an Uber to the city centre and continue there. Nick, zealous in joining the group heading into one of the disco clubs, ordered a double shot of vodka at the counter in a silly pursuit to get into the mood for nightclubbing as he was never much into that. It was this moment that triggered a chain of events that would later cause Nick to loathe himself for several months coming. The unfortunate mix of beer and alcohol obscured the memory of the following hours from Nick. There was a huge window in Nick's memory. Now, it was 7 in the morning, Nick was sitting on the curb, his head still spinning, yet he started to be aware of himself and his surroundings. He grabbed his iPhone to check the time, but the display didn't start since the battery was dead. Suddenly, he felt an urge to check his wallet, so he took it out of his jacket, opened it, and to a great horror found out it was empty. As he started lamenting his decision to join his teammates in nightclubbing, a small yellow note slipped from a side section of his wide-opened wallet. He inspected the intricate handwriting on the note that went: "Thank you for the unforgettable night. Cynthia" doesn't work..

better:

"a silly
attempt"

well-done!

nicely told story. Good use of vocals. Good structures. tense -

Thanks, J.